In a time in which monogamy is used as a spelling bee word, "Def Jam's How to Be a Player" isn't going to have a lot of people openly praising the movie in mixed company. A person just saying he liked it could be enough to spark agitated discussions: The title refers to someone who has one main mate and yet intimately socializes with several others; a Player knows when to say the right things and when to bluff. For date-night moviegoers, one of the film's target demos, the best strategy might be to cheer for the same gender as one's companion.

Sensitized because she was dropped like a bad habit by her boyfriend, Jenny ("B.A.P.S.") Natalie Desselle) targets her brother Dray (Bill Bellamy, best known from cable's "MTV Jams"), who she feels is a womanizer who treats his women like whores. She concocts a scheme to put a kink in his game(plan). With the help of her friend Katrina ("Virtuosity's" Mari Morrow), she hacks his organizer's access code and proceeds to invite Dray's multiracial collection of femmes to the same party, with the aim of creating a hostile environment that will make this Player repent and be reborn.

Ballamy plays Dray in a way that isn't likely to seem overly offensive, thanks to knowing nods to the audience. A supporting cast humorously blend in their characters to make the tale's multiple scenarios flow. One who perpetrates Playerism (Pierre) and two

TALK OF ANGELS ★★★

Starring Polly Walker, Frances McDormand, Vincent Perez and Franco Nero. Directed by Nick Hamm. Written by Ann Guedes & Frank McGuinness. Produced by Patrick Cassavetti. A Miramax release. Romance. Rated PG for some politically motivated violence. Running time: 97 min.

If Miramax learned one thing from "The English Patient," it was that romance and war make compelling cinematic bedfellows (a lesson that seemed to have become lost since the days of "Gone With the Wind," "Doctor Zhivago" and "The Sound of Music"). Unfortunately for the brothers Weinstein, the formula doesn't work to that extent in "Talk of Angels." Lovingly adapted by Ann Guedes and Frank McGuinness from Kate O'Brien's novel "Mary Lavelle" and ably directed by veteran West End stage director Nick Hamm, "Talk of Angels" is an undeniably beautiful and often seductive tale of colliding cultural sensibilities and ferocious passions, all set to the backdrop of an impending Spanish Civil War. Sadly, the passions depicted on-screen are fairly tepid ones, playing more like a dime novel than the meaningful epic the filmmakers intended.

Its notion of a reserved English-speaking woman liberated by Latin passions is nothing new to the movies. In this instance, though, the Polly Walker/Vincent Perez pairing doesn't quite click. At times, the filmmakers almost seem to expect the sheer beauty of the two actors to substitute for chemistry. What ultimately salvages the film from mediocrity is nothing less than the craft of its execution, a credit to first-time helmer Hamm and an excellent supporting cast that includes Frances McDormand ("Fargo") as one of Mary's fellow Irish governesses.—Wade Major

PICTURE PERFECT ★★

Starring Jennifer Aniston, Kevin Bacon, Jay Mohr and Illeana Douglas. Directed by Glenn Gordon Caron. Written by Arlene Sorkin, Paul Slansky and Glenn Gordon Caron. Produced by Erwin Stoff. A Fox release. Romantic comedy. Rated PG-13 for sensuality and related dialogue. Running time: 102 min.

Jennifer Aniston ("She's the One") stars in this slight and contrived romantic comedy as Kate, an ambitious advertising executive who in order to "dress the part" lets her bosses believe she is engaged to a random man in a photo, Nick ("Jerry Maguire's" Jay Mohr), that she met only briefly at a friend's wedding. Having the fictitional fiance wins her a promotion, but Kate's bosses want to meet the man. Kate persuades Nick to help her out of her predicament. Nick, who's been looking for a excuse to see Kate again, is glad to oblige

The actors share a few cute moments and try to make the most of obvious situations The script has interesting comments t make about the expectations people plac on love, marriage and commitment, but fails to follow through; its structure disinte grates just at the point when it should tak off, when Kate faces actually wanting to b with Nick, now against the wishes of he bosses. Of course, the problem here as wit most romantic comedies is that there is ver little to draw these two people togethe Particularly, Nick has many more reasons t dislike Kate than to like her. Yet it's easy t forgive these movies, given enough funn sidekicks, interesting situations and cleve lines—all of which, unfortunately, "Pictur Perfect" has too few.—Susan Lambert

SPAWN ★★★

Starring Michael Jai White, John Leguizamo, Theresa Randle, D.B Sweeney and Martin Sheen. Directed by Mark A.Z. Dippe. Written by Alan McElroy. Produced by Clint Goldman A New Line release. SF/action. Rated PG-13 for thematic elements involving the demonic underworld, violence, in tense fantasy action and crude humor Running time: 95 min.

"Spawn" opens with a spectacular se quence that creates a living comic book lik no other, and issues a warning: All roads lea to heaven or hell, depending on ones' choice life is the test. Twisted between his ow slowly remembered nature and the fantasti powers of the Devil Malebolgia is blac superhero Spawn, played by Michael Ja White ("City of Industry"). Once human, nov a creature born from hell to do its bidding Spawn can't be what he was (human) yet can be what he was created to be (evil).

"Spawn" is the feature version of a mega successful comic book series (also calle "Spawn") created by writer/artist Tod McFarlane. The screen "Spawn" terrorize its namesake/hero less than the comic serie (a rough cut was edited after getting an R rating for pervasive violent content an menace), slows down some character reve lations and is less literal a translation tha the HBO series. Yet it delivers a satisfyin rendition of the comic's essence, as super naturals battle to destroy or protect mortals

The movie belongs to Jai White, whos eyes, voice and movements lock the audienc into his heart and struggle. Playing Clown, a agent of the Devil, John Leguizamo ("Rome and Juliet") delights by delivering wickedl funny lines throughout and moving nimbl despite a heavy costume. A Dippe Goldma Williams production, "Spawn" uses 375 visua effects shots to create a dark and comple world. Those effects are well integrated an cleverly active; the best, if too sparingly used is Spawn in the kinetic red cape of his ful costume. Also good are church and city sets What're missing are pieces of story logic and clear climax, but perhaps the latter holds prom ise of more to come.—Karen Achenbach

Starring Samuel L. Jackson, Kelly Rowan and John Heard. Directed by Kevin Reynolds. Written by Scott Yagemann. Produced by Bruce Davey and Steve McEveety. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated R for violence, strong language, drug usage and brief nudity. Running time: 120 min.

There have been several good teacher/bad student films in the past few years, standouts among them "Dangerous Minds" and "The Substitute." This drama isn't quite in that class. In "187" (the California penal code for murder), Trevor (Samuel L. Jackson) is a teacher whose career is changed by a student attack. After recovery, he returns as a substitute at a different school—a school that has metal detectors and a disrespectful student body. In genre tradition, he is assigned to the worst class on campus. When the rules don't work, he decides that extreme discipline is needed.

Written by a former teacher (Scott Yagemann) for seven years in the Los Angeles public school system, "187" shows evidence of all-too-real-life events and built-up frustrations. Though filled with insights, the film's episodic nature means "187" falls short: Its intent seems to be to leave beneficial impressions on a school-age audience, but it makes its points too intellectually. It's a pyrrhic victory, benefiting the high-minded filmmakers but leaving the audience a casualty.—Dwayne E. Leslie

THE WINNER ★★★

Starring Vincent D'Onofrio, Rebecca DeMornay, Delroy Lindo and Michael Madsen. Directed by Alex Cox. Written by Wendy Riss. Produced by Kenneth Schwenker. A Live release. Drama. Rated R for strong language, along with some violence and sexuality. Running time: 90 min.

Quirky and stylish, "The Winner" is yet another entry in the neo-noir genre. What distinguishes it from its brethren is its emphasis on character and leisurely pacing, rather than a labyrinthine plot or visual pyrotechnics. It's a highly stylized film; making the most of its Vegas locations, it nonetheless makes the city look unreal. Philip ("The Whole Wide World's" Vincent D'Onofrio), the story's man on a winning streak, lives in a so-new-it's-raw housing development, creepy in its suburban banality. It's not a vision of Las Vegas audiences have seen before. The strong cast—all character actors par excellence—breathe life into nightlife types that could easily have been cliches.

D'Onofrio is fine playing a man so decent and unassuming he seems like a dimwit, and Rebecca DeMornay makes a compelling lowlife. In the last act, "The Winner" takes an odd left turn into surrealism, a move that perhaps played better on stage (the film is based on Wendy Riss' play). Still, the movie is well worth a look for its coherent and original vision of the American obsession with luck, glamor, riches, violence and true love.—Cathy Thompson-Georges

GOOD BURGER ★★★1/2

Starring Kenan Thompson, Kel Mitchel, Abe Vigoda and Sinbad. Directed by Brian Robbins. Written by Dan Schneider and Kevin Kopelow & Heath Seifert. Produced by Mike Tollin and Brian Robbins. A Paramount release. Comedy. Rated PG for language, some comic violence and mild sex-related humor. Running time: 95 min.

"Good Burger" is fat with laughs, good for your heart, and the film introduction of cable network Nickelodeon's two most popular young stars: Kenan Thompson and Kel Mitchel (of "All That" and "Kenan & Kel"), a sensational comedy duo the likes of which haven't been seen since Abbott and Costello. As directed by Brian Robbins, in big, bright close-ups, Kenan and Kel breathe heart and soul into this tale of virtue winning over all, and false friendship becoming real.

Presented in association with Nickelodeon Movies, "Good Burger," a Tollin/Robbins production, is a tasty serving of quality family fare. Jokes are built on Ed's wild leaps of mind: When offered a bribe, "How does $10 sound?", Ed crinkles a tenspot to his ear. Tender moments with Shaquille O'Neal and an exceptional dance sequence with George Clinton stand out, and the score jams. —Karen Achenbach

AIR FORCE ONE ★★1/2

Starring Harrison Ford, Gary Oldman, Wendy Crewson, William H. Macy and Glenn Close. Directed by Wolfgang Petersen. Written by Andrew W. Marlowe. Produced by Wolfgang Petersen, Gail Katz, Armyan Bernstein and Jon Shestack. A Columbia release. Action. Rated R for violence. Running time: 120 min.

Yet another tired "Die Hard" rehash wrapped around a ridiculous premise, "Air Force One" nevertheless stays aloft for the better part of its two-hour running time thanks to the diversionary skills of director Wolfgang Petersen ("In the Line of Fire") and some superb acting from Harrison Ford. In the end, however, as is increasingly the case with Hollywood action pictures, credibility is stretched too thin for even the best of talents to salvage this story of an American president (Ford) hijacked by terrorists led by the usual genre psycho ("The Fifth Element's" Gary Oldman).

Although the interior of Air Force One might not exactly compare to his World War II "Das Boot" U-boat, Petersen does manage to sustain the film's suspense and intensity well beyond what its premise merits. Ford, likewise, appears so believably presidential that even fistfuls of action-film cliches start to seem fresh. But Oldman adds another over-acted villain to his c.v., with temperamental exclamations of "Shaaaht aahp!" and repeated lectures on the lost glory of "Maaahther Raaahsia" verging on comedy. Also, as the film winds to a close, claustrophobic tension once again gives way to overblown digital effects and outlandish set pieces enough to make Ford yearn for the calmer days aboard the Millennium Falcon.—Wade Major

THE LONG WAY HOME ★★★

Narrated by Morgan Freeman. Directed and written by Mark Jonathan Harris. Produced by Rabbi Marvin Hier and Richard Trank. A Seventh Arts release. Documentary. Not yet rated. Running time: 120 min. Opens 9/19.

Time and again in this documentary about the fate of displaced European Jewry in the post-World War II years, odd but moving images appear: marriages in Bergen-Belsen, the former Nazi concentration camp; Jews being placed in Allied camps surrounded by all-too-familiar barbed wire and guard houses; the gaunt and near-dead Nazi victims newly rescued from the likes of Dachau turning their backs on their emancipators, the better to avoid their looks of horror.

Although the driving spirit of the Jewish people 50 years ago and of this Mark Jonathan Harris film—to have their own homeland in Palestine—might in current application suggest to an answer to today's Palestinian question that reaches beyond the intent here, "The Long Way Home" is a finely made effort recalling the struggles of the Jewish people in their second Exodus era. The footage, from film libraries worldwide, is well edited together; the simplicity of Harris' script and Morgan Freeman's narration is effectively conceived.—Kim Williamson

GRAVESEND ★1/2

Starring Michael Parducci and Tony Tucci. Directed and written by Salvatore Stabile. Produced by Toni Ross, Mark Ross and Daniel Edelman. A Manga release. Action/drama. Rated R for violence, drug content and strong language throughout. Run time: 85 min. Opens 9/5 NY, late Sept. LA.

Boys boys guns guns blah blah. (Or how to get the audience to want your protagonists dead.) "Gravesend" is more proof that improvising, like jet piloting, takes skill, and that a gun is what the brain-dead clutch in lieu of thinking.

In this action/drama, presented by Oliver Stone, four intolerable characters with no mental or emotional equipment try to handle serious problems. Mackey Aquilino ("Donnie Brasco") as JoJo the Junkie is as authentic as the locations, and emotional satisfaction is provided via exceptionally real scenes—all, however, involving supporting characters. And there is a moment in a car with its radio on (Louis Armstrong singing "It's a Wonderful World") where moviegoers will wish even one characters had Arm-strong's class or intelligence. But these humans are like xeraxes of xeroxes: The stuff is gone.—Karen Achenbach

SOUL IN THE HOLE ★★★1/2

Directed by Danielle Gardner. Produced by Lilibet Foster. A Northern Arts release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 90 min. Opens 8/8 NY, widens Sept.

A deeply involving look at the raucous inner-city subculture of in-your-face street basketball, Danielle Gardner's wonderful feature-length documentary "Soul in the Hole" is a passionate piece of work that will engross people with no interest in Division I athletics or the NBA. The film follows the fortunes of the Kenny's Kings team, based in Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant neighborhood, as the players defend their championship reputation against challengers from all over New York City during the long hot summer of 1993. More than just a chronicle of wins, losses and breathtaking plays, "Soul in the Hole" captures the gritty spirit of the game and carnival atmosphere of the tournaments.—Alex Albanese

STAR MAPS ★1/2

Starring Douglas Spain, Efrain Figueroa, Kandeyce Jorden, Martha Velez and Lysa Flores. Directed and written by Miguel Arteta. Produced by Matthew Greenfield. A Fox Searchlight release. Drama. Rated R for strong sexuality and language, and for violence. Running time: 87 min.

Douglas Spain stars as Carlos, a young Hispanic man who returns to his family in L.A. determined to be a star after working as an actor in Mexico. Despite the protests of his sweet sister Maria (Lysa Flores), Carlos goes to work for his manipulative father, Pepe (Efrain Figueroa), a pimp to a group of young men who sell star maps on the streets as a front for prostitution. Carlos has kinky sex with both Johns and Janes, hoping his dad will reward him with help getting into show business. When Carlos on his own gets a break from a smitten actress/customer (Kandeyce Jorden), who's determined to put him on her TV show, an all-out war with Pepe ensues.

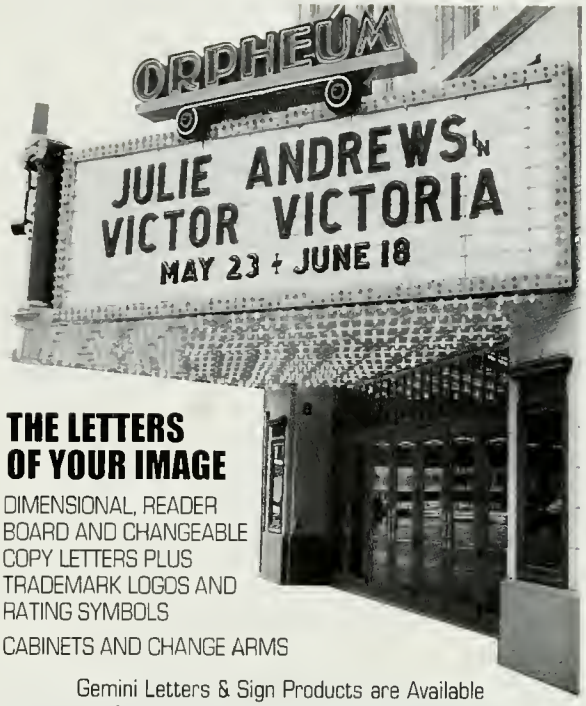
First-time filmmaker Miguel Arteta seeks profundity in Carlos' quest to become an actor and escape his brutal dad, but their emotional confrontations don't engage the audience. What's worse is that the director seems to want his film to be topical, funny, shocking and sweet, all at the same time; Arteta should have stuck to Carlos' grittier story instead of taking excursions into other terrain.—Carole Glines

OPERATION CONDOR ★★★★

Starring Jackie Chan, Carol Cheng, Eva Cobo De Garcia and Shoko Ikeda. Directed by Jackie Chan. Written by Jackie Chan and Edward Tang. Produced by Leonard Ho. A Dimension/Miramax release. Action/adventure. Rated PG-13 for martial arts action and some shootings, and for sensuality. Running time: 89 min.

The third time's the charm for Jackie Chan ("Rumble in the Bronx"): His latest import sports nonstop fun and madcap mayhem. Miramax's Dimension label has done a good job of tightening the original 1991 Hong Kong film (entitled "Armor of God II: Operation Condor"). The sequel has little to do with the original 1987 "Armor of God" (which Jackie Chan also directed and starred in) except for the leading character: Jackie (code name: Condor), a globe-trotting Chinese Indiana Jones/James Bond.

"Operation Condor" is one of the best Chan movies and the first Chan-directed film to be released in America. Most importantly, Dimension has made sure to secure a PG-13 rating (as opposed to the R rating given to both New Line's "Rumble in the Bronx" and "Supercop"), thus expanding the movie audience to include those in America who might most appreciate Chan's blend of goofy humor and endless action: young teenagers.



By Chan standards, the story is straightforward and solid, if simple and often silly. Yet any Chan film is really just an excuse for extended chase sequences and spectacular fight scenes that highlight Chan's physical prowess and comic timing, and Chan's high action/comedy hijinks are in top form here.—Susan Lambert

KISS ME GUIDO ★★1/2

Starring Nick Scotti and Anthony Barrile. Directed and written by Tony Vitale. Produced by Ira Deutchman and Christine Vachon. A Paramount release. Comedy. Rated R for sexuality and strong language. Running time: 89 min.

The premise has potential: In dire need of rent money, Warren (Anthony Barrile) advertises for a GWM (Gay White Male) to share his apartment. Homophobic Frankie (Nick Scotti) answers the ad, thinking GWM means Guy With Money, and comedic consternations ensue.

The film's intent is to show how the fundamentally opposite roommates learn from one another and grow in the process, but the comic possibilities of this construct are barely explored. (The similar "Maybe...Maybe Not" exploited this culture-clash concept overlapping the two protagonists' worlds more.) Frankie isn't exposed to enough of Warren's friends, family or pastimes, and vice versa, to fully demonstrate the wide differences between the unlikely roomies.

which would ultimately spawn an exciting new wave of filmmaker. Thus, a film like Shainee Gabel and Kristin Hahn's stunning documentary "Anthem," shot on videotape by two young women with a dream and a tank of gas.

Their quest: to chronicle what is and what has become of the "American Dream." Having stabbed at the core of today's American psyche through interviews with dozens of people ranging in influence from waitress to White House aide, they pour out a complex study of the loss of pride and dignity in America, and the burning desire by people of all walks of life for authentic heroes and valiant political leadership.

The film is weakened by never-ending editorials by the filmmakers. Nevertheless, "Anthem" stands as a vital and unique testament to the vigor and scope of the American way of life; this is the rare kind of film that should be placed in a time capsule for future generations so they might have a better appreciation of our moment in history.—Jon Alon Walz

THE LAST TIME I COMMITTED SUICIDE ★1/2

Starring Thomas Jane, Keanu Reeves and Claire Forlani. Directed and written by Stephen Kay. Produced by Edward Bates and Louise Rosner. A Roxie release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality. Running time: 93 min.

Based on a letter by would-be poet Neal Cassady (Thomas Jane) to writer Jack Kerouac in the 1950s, an elliptical screenplay by writer/director Stephen Kay ("Intimate Power") follows Cassady through several nights of revelry as he romances a suicidal young woman ("Basquiat's" Claire Forlani) and hangs with his buddy (Keanu Reeves) at a Denver pool hall, getting drunk and gabbing endlessly about anything.

The existential angst and restlessness of the 1950s Beat generation are not conveyed with any dramatic impact or perception in this Kushner-Locke/Tapestry production, which tries to make art out of shallowness and vocuity. For all his well-meaning intentions, Kay fails to grasp the spiritual malaise and rebellion of the lifestyle.—Dale Winogura

TETSUO II: BODY HAMMER ★★★

Starring Tomoroh Taguchi, Nobu Kanaoka and Shinya Tsukamato. Directed and written by Shinya Tsukamoto. Produced by Fuminori Shishido and Fumio Kurokawa. A Manga release. SF. Japanese-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Run time: 83 min.

Writer/director/DP/art director/editor Shinya Tsukamoto also co-stars in his aptly named film ("Tetsu" = iron; "o" = man) about humans who transform themselves into metal (here, guns). In this 1991 Toshiba EMI/Kaiyju production, a reworking of Tsukamoto's 1989 "Tetsuo: Iron Man" (same cast and concept, different plot and setting), mutant skinheads chase a Japanese salaryman (punk music superstar Tomoroh Taguchi) through dark, fragmented shots—stunning for making Tokyo appear empty as well as for posing small human bodies against the infinite webs of glass and steel that cities have become.

Color gels add to the visual effect, as does Chu Ishikawa's punk-industrial score. But interest in the story doesn't really penetrate until the movie's final third, when numerous plot revelations up the tempo.—Karen Achenbach

SUDDEN MANHATTAN ★★★

Starring Adrienne Shelly, Louise Lasser and Tim Guinec. Directed and written by Adrienne Shelly. Produced by Marcia Kirkley. A Phaedra release. Comedy. Unrated. Time: 80 min.

The sweetly dippy and bonkers "Sudden Manhattan" details the descent of a lonely young New Yorker (writer/director Adrienne Shelly) into existential madness with offbeat humor and gentle strangeness. Although the influences of Hal Hartley, Woody Allen, Roman Polanski and David Lynch are obvious, Shelly's daffy comic Scotti's performance as Frankie carries the movie, adding most of the film's humor as the literal and figurative straight man. He manages to make sympathetic and charming his character of the homophobic yet otherwise (mostly) virtuous "guido" (a derogatory term for gold-chain-wearing, brashly mannered, style-impaired Italian-Americans who venerate machismo). Like the premise, first-time writer/director Tony Vitale also has potential—if he increases the adventuresome aspects of his ideas.—Christine James

NOTHING TO LOSE ★★1/2

Starring Tim Robbins, Martin Lawrence, John C. McGinley, Giancarlo Esposito and Kelly Preston. Directed and written by Steve Oedekerk. Produced by Martin Bregman, Dan Jinks and Michael Bregman. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated R for pervasive strong language and a sex scene. Running time: 98 min.

This Touchstone effort doesn't exactly recapture the golden formula of such previous mismatched interracial buddy pictures as "48HRS.," "Trading Places" and the "Lethal Weapon" series, but it does manage to maintain a hapless charm of its own that, although often clumsy and unfocused, should please fans of its two male leads.

Tim Robbins ("The Shawshank Redemption") stars as Nick Beam, a Los Angeles advertising executive whose happy married life comes to a crashing halt when he comes to believe that his wife ("Jerry Maguire's" Kelly Preston) is having an affair with his boss ("That Darn Cat's" Michael KcKean). Before he can complete a downward spiral into suicidal despair, he becomes the victim of carjacker T. Paul ("A Thin Line Between Love and Hate's" Martin Lawrence). Having literally "nothing to lose," Nick turns the tables on his attacker, taking the man on a journey of comic terror.

As buddy pictures go, "Nothing to Lose" is one of the more obvious ones, with hardly an original or inventive twist to be found. Thanks to the comic chemistry between Robbins and Lawrence, the damage is minimal. Like a modern-day Laurel and Hardy, Robbins offers droll understatement while Lawrence effects manic outbursts. For writer/director Steve Oedekerk, the film is a middling success: a monumental step up from his last effort as a hyphenate, "Ace Ventura: When Nature Calls," yet well shy of the more balanced resonance of his winning "The Nutty Professor" script.—Wade Major

CONTACT ★★★1/2

Starring Jodie Foster, Matthew McConaughey and Tom Skerritt. Directed by Robert Zemeckis. Written by James V. Hart and Michael Goldenberg. Produced by Robert Zemeckis and Steve Starkey. A Warner Bros. release. SF/drama. Rated PG for some intense action, mild language and a scene of sensuality. Running time: 150 min.

"Contact" connects, thanks to an intelligent script by Michael Goldenberg ("Bed of Roses") and James V. Hart (adapting from the Carl Sagan novel) and a strong performance from Jodie Foster as Ellie, a driven scientist who has devoted her life to searching the airwaves for signals from space. It's not "ID4"/"MIB" movie fare; there are no slime-gushing assassinations and only one explosion. The film's dramatic elements and its philosophic rather than pyrotechnic nature, along with its spanning of the sci-fi, drama, comedy, romance, suspense/thriller and fantasy/adventure genres, make the latest from Robert Zemeckis ("Forrest Gump") a sci-fier for sophisticated audiences.

One day, miraculously, Ellie's efforts pay off: There is a signal from space. Even as mayhem results among the masses, out of Ellie's past steps Palmer Joss ("A Time to Kill's" Matthew McConaughey, occasionally too charming), an easygoing spiritualist who's now the president's religious adviser. Aside from his role as the love interest, the point of Palmer's character seems to be to draw a parallel between the spiritual and the scientific, though the results are not entirely successful.

Unlike so many other alien-themed movies, "Contact" doesn't disappoint (at least not entirely) with regard to providfantasia has its own unique voice and rhythm, at once bizarre and playful.

The polished style and breezy pace of Shelly's promising debut prevent any arty pretensions from seeping in, and so does her delightfully unaffected narration. "Sudden Manhattan" is a weird yet oddly endearing surreal adventure.—Dale Winogura

HIJACKING HOLLYWOOD ★★1/2

Starring Henry Thomas and Scott Thompson. Directed and produced by Neil Mandt. Written by Neil Mandt and Jim Rossow. A Curb release. Comedy. Unrated. Running time: 92 min.

A breezy, amusing little Hollywood satire, "Hijacking Hollywood" eventually burdens itself with expository dialogue the actors aren't equipped to handle. But writer/director/actor Neil Mandt sustains a brisk pace for the most part with some biting and sophisticated humor and astute perceptions on the movie racket.

Resourcefully made on a low budget, "Hijacking Hollywood" allows Mandt to rib the L.A. lifestyle and the movie business broadly at times, but there are enough funny observations.—Dale Winogura

LIKE A BRIDE ★★★1/2

Stars Claudette Maille and Maya Mishalska. Directed by Guita Schyfter. Written by Hugo Hirlart. Produced by Tita Lombardo. An Atara release. Drama. Spanish- and Ladino-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 90 minutes.

The thriving experience of Mexican Jewry is lovingly detailed in "Like a Bride" ("Novia Que Te Vea"), a delicate and subtle drama based on Rosa Nissan's novel. The film, which won five Ariel awards, follows the friendship in 1960s Mexico City of two young girls, Oshinica (Claudette Maille) and Rifke (Maya Mishalska). Oshinica comes from a conservative Sephardic family that traces its lineage to Spain before the Jews were expelled from that country. Rifke's parents are more liberal Ashkenazi, Eastern European Jews driven from the continent by the Holocaust.

Familiar Jewish themes of assimilation versus tradition are filtered through a fresh perspective, resulting in a film that reverberates in a unique way, greatly aided by Guita Schyfter's light, effective direction and poignant performances by the young leads.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

NO ORDINARY LOVE 1/2

Starring Smith Forte and Ericka Klein. Directed and written by Doug Witkins. Produced by Eli Kabillio. A Phaedra release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 104 min.

A group of multi-racial gay and straight friends and lovers living in the same house are supposedly examined in a low-suds soap opera narrative that climaxes in a convoluted yet tepid murder mystery.

A big hit at gay film fests, "No Ordinary Love" is a crude, incoherent mishmash that takes too long to get started and doesn't develop interesting ideas. The first hour is a clumsy set-up for moments of intense character realization in the last reels, but it's not enough to compensate for all the ill-assorted subplots.—Dale Winogura

RAISING HEROES ★★1/2

Starring Troy Sostillio and Henry White. Directed, written and produced by Douglas Langway. A Phaedra release. Thriller. Unrated. Running time: 85 min.

A somewhat diverting, occasionally suspenseful little thriller, "Raising Heroes" is marred by plot holes, hokey contrivances and detracting experimentalist touches. But writer/director/producer/editor Douglas Langway deserves praise for displaying a canny cinematic eye and for treating his central gay roles without patronizing advocacy or preciousness in this story of a gay couple (played with tenderness by Troy Sostillio and Henry White) planning to adopt a child when their lives become endangered after one of them witnesses a convenience-store robbery and the culprits come gunning for them.—Dale Winogura ing outtasight sights. Special effects are imaginatively used to take audiences on an interspacial tour. Ultimately, though, the unknown can only be glimpsed, and it's implied that we aren't ready to be made fully aware of the wonders of the universe. It's a trite way of avoiding the effort of creating an alien world that can live up to sustained scrutiny.

Still, the drama unfolding on earth is the greater focus of the filmmakers. Reaction to history's greatest discovery is shown as being militantly divided, and astute commentary is made on how such news would actually affect the world. At two-and-a-half hours, "Contact" is well-paced with humor, humanity, and an electrifyingly ascending momentum.—Christine James

A SIMPLE WISH ★★

Starring Mara Wilson, Martin Short, Kathleen Turner, Robert Pastorelli and Amanda Plummer. Directed by Michael Ritchie. Written by Jeff Rothberg. Produced by Sid, Bill and Jon Sheinberg. A Universal release. Comedy. Rated PG for mild language. Running time: 90 min.

Efforts to produce a broad-based family film with equal appeal for adults and children fall flat in "A Simple Wish," an almost too simple fantasy that hedges so indecisively between full-blown fantasy and satire that it never does justice to either genre.

In the wake of her "Matilda" success, Mara Wilson stars as Anabel, yet another wide-eyed, wonder-struck child in search of a better future; in this case, that consists of soliciting her "fairy godmother." Unfortunately, Anabel's fairy godmother turns out to be a bungling fella named Murray (comedian Martin Short, last seen in "Mars Attacks!").

Had screenwriter Jeff Rothberg and director Michael Ritchie chosen to play this Bubble Factory production as a straightforward fantasy with all the requisite mirth and malice, "A Simple Wish" might have worked as a proper children's film. Instead, the filmmakers trade charm for satire, overloading the narrative with "hip" adult references. Children, of course, won't appreciate the references, and adults are likely to find their inclusion in a film of this sort more curious than amusing.—Wade Major

THIS WORLD, THEN THE FIREWORKS ★★1/2

Starring Billy Zane, Gina Gershon, Sheryl Lee and Rue McClanahan. Directed by Michael Oblowitz. Written by Larry Gross. Produced by Chris Hanley, Brad Wyman and Larry Gross. An Orion Classics release. Drama. Rated R for strong violence, sexuality and language. Running time: 99 min.

"God rigged it, we take the hits" is the weltanschauung of this modestly convincing adaptation of a 1955 Jim Thompson short story about two troubled grifters. Born twins, Marty and Carol Lakewood (Billy Zane and Gina Gershon) while still children saw their father, caught naked in bed with a neighbor's wife by an outraged husband, shotgun the man, their little faces sprayed by blood. Now a muckraking journalist equally interested in roiling life's muck and in raking transgressors on to their eternal unreward, often while quoting biblical derangements, Marty has always had a special bond with sis, a we-against-the-world attitude. Fate brings the dark-hearted duo together again as Marty and Carol, who is now a well-upholstered prostitute, ID a mark: an apparently repressed and lonely patrolwoman, Lois Archer ("Bliss'" Sheryl Lee), who owns beachfront property. Machination and murder follow.

"This World, Then the Fireworks" has almost as many problems as its leads. Right from the opening credits, a wildly overdone jazz score announces the filmmakers' too-hip-for-the-house approach to Thompson's work; they go in with cigarettes dangling from their lips, and the smoke seems to blind them to their real job of getting at these two lost souls' humanity.

Debut director's Michael Oblowitz helming and Larry Gross' scripting are overbaked outside yet uncongealed inside, but the work of Zane, Gershon and Lee could hardly be better. All three have shown an eagerness to take on on-the-edge projects, and they deliver here. Each of their three characters is a misfit built of conflicting emotions and desires, and it's a delight to watch the performers' faces handle the challenge.—Kim Williamson

OUT TO SEA ★★★1/2

Starring Jack Lemmon, Walter Matthau, Dyan Cannon, Gloria DeHaven, Brent Spiner, Elaine Stritch, Hal Linden, Donald O'Connor, Edward Mulhare and Rue McClanahan. Directed by Martha Coolidge. Written by Robert Nelson Jacobs. Produced by John Davis and David T. Friendly. A Fox release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for language and sex-related humor. Running time: 105 min.

In their first non-"Grumpy" pairing since the 1993 reteaming that earned them a new generation of fans, Walter Matthau and Jack Lemmon head "Out to Sea" to once again prove that flab, ear hair and enlarged prostates are no obstacles to attracting beautiful and sexy women.

Only in the movies.

The hijinks begin when chronic gambler Charlie (Matthau) cons his widowed brother-in-law Herb (Lemmon) into joining him on a Caribbean cruise, on which Charlie plans to seduce a woman of sufficient means to support his habit. What Charlie hasn't told Herb is that he enrolled them as dance hosts to avoid paying for the cruise. The expected hijanks ensue.

Although the romantic twists and turns that follow are fairly obvious, Matthau and Lemmon's effortless charms and impeccable timing keep things brisk and lively throughout. Unlike their previous efforts, however, the actors here thrive less on their interaction with each other than on their respective romantic entanglements, allowing for a more diverse collection of dramatic and comic possibilities. The supporting cast also provides able work.

For director Martha Coolidge ("Three Wishes"), "Out to Sea" marks a welcome and successful return to the breezy comedic sensibilities she first displayed in her debut film, "Valley Girl." Most of the film's other creative credits are just serviceable, with the exception of David Newman's score, which is superb.—Wade Major

WILD AMERICA ★★★

Starring Jonathan Taylor Thomas, Devon Sawa and Scott Bairstow. Directed by William Dear. Written by David Michael Weiger. Produced by James G. Robinson, Irby Smith and Mark Stouffer. A Warner Bros. release. Adventure. Rated PG for language and some adventure peril. Running time: 103 min.

Kids from six to 16 will get a kick out of "Wild America," a fact-based outdoor adventure story about three brothers who spend a summer roaming the American wilderness photographing animals. Prepubescent and teenaged girls can feast their eyes on a trio of high school hearthrhrobs: Jonathan Taylor Thomas ("The Adventures of Pinocchio"), Devon Sawa ("Casper") and Scott Bairstow ("White Fang 2"); boys in the audience will relate to the camaraderie and daredevil antics of the lead characters.

BOYS LIFE: Scott Bairstow, Jonathan Taylor Thomas and Devon Sawa in "Wild America."

The Morgan Creek production is based on the childhood experiences of producer Mark Stouffer and his two brothers, Marshall and Marty, who spent the summer of 1967 driving across America documenting on film the nation's vanishing wildlife. The story is seen through the eyes of 12-year-old Marshall (Thomas), constantly tormented by his older siblings. But, proving the dictum that "those things that don't kill us make us stronger," Marshall's treatment has made him fearless, which proves a blessing on the trio's dangerous journey.

The Stouffer brothers recorded their adventures on 16mm; it was their first nature documentary and the start of careers as prize-winning wildlife filmmakers. The three actors come across as real siblings, filled with mischief, daring, misjudgment, rivalry and at bottom a genuine love and respect for one another.—Jean Oppenheimer

THE SWAN PRINCESS: ESCAPE FROM CASTLE MOUNTAIN ★1/2

Voices by Michelle Nicastro, Douglas Sills and Jake Williamson. Directed by Richard Rich. Written by Brian Nissen. Produced by Richard Rich and Jared F. Brown. A Legacy release. Animation. Rated G. Running time: 71 min.

Though it's somewhat more active and colorful than its dismal predecessor, "The Swan Princess," this sequel is pretty much just more stiff, unpolished animation for undiscriminating family audiences, lacking wonder and imagination. The few moments of charm and sweetness can be traced to Brian Nissen's occasionally clever script, but Richard Rich's pandering, immature direction is almost as blatantly amateurish in technique as his handling of the original (which was a success, unaccountably).

Bright colors and backgrounds are diminished by an absence of character detail and personality, with stilted motions and inexpressive faces in their place. Even worse, the three original songs by Lex de Azevedo and Clive Romney are only slightly more melodic and graceful than the tunes in the previous film; one number is a misfired and misplaced attempt at a rock-music style. As bland and unsophisticated as most children's TV, this is the kind of inept cartoon feature that sets the cause of good animation back a couple of decades. One plus: It's short.—Dale Winogura

HEAD ABOVE WATER ★★

Starring Cameron Diaz, Harvey Keitel, Craig Sheffer and Billy Zane. Directed by Jim Wilson. Written by Theresa Marie. Produced by Jim Wilson and John M. Jacobsen. A Fine Line release. Drama. Rated PG-13 for thematic elements and some moments of strong violence. Running time: 92 min.

From the school of film noir comes "Head Above Water," a sometimes original but largely ineffective thriller. Nathalie (Cameron Diaz), an ex-drug addict, is vacationing in Maine with her husband George (Harvey Keitel), the judge who gave her a reduced sentence. Also around is handyman Lance (Craig Sheffer), a childhood friend of Nathalie's who's always had a crush on her. Then another old friend, Kent ("The Phantom's" Billy Zane), arrives to make a play for Nathalie when Lance and George are off fishing—but Kent soon winds up dead on her bed. Whodunnit?

The acting, which needs to be razor-sharp in such a film, is substandard. Nathalie is mainly a reactive character; though Diaz is onscreen more than in "My Best Friend's Wedding," she has less to do. Sheffer, the weak link in "Bliss," turns in another stonefaced performance. As the seemingly meek George, Keitel is atypically bland. To its detriment, the film tries too hard to shoehorn these characters into complex situations, which fails because the people are so dull. But to their credit the filmmakers don't telegraph their plot twists too often; there are real surprises.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

FRANK CAPRA'S AMERICAN DREAM ★★★

Narrated by Ron Howard. Directed and written by Ken Bowser. Produced by Charles Duncombe. Executive produced by Tom Capra and Frank Capra Jr. A Columbia Repertory release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 109 min.

Here's a proposal for a new axiom about documentaries: beware of biographical sagas that refer to their subject by first name. "Frank Capra's American Dream" is more artful and informative in the way it conveys its hidden agenda, but at bottom it's almost as suspect as the promotional "documentaries" the Disney Studios used to churn out with such regularity—which helped create a mystique around "Walt" so pervasive that many viewers above a certain generational threshold still believe the most successful animation producer in the history of movies actually had a hand in drawing his own cartoons.

CAPRA MAN: The late James Stewart with Jean Arthur in Frank Capra's "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

He didn't, of course, just as Frank Capra had no real hand in the writing of his signature works of the sound era. Yet—aside from an obligatory nod to Capra's most famous scenarist, Robert Riskin (which of course makes no mention of the competitive tensions that surrounded and ultimately destroyed their relationship)—you'd never know it to watch this movie. But that's just a sin of omission, not on a par with the outright, albeit masterfully subtle, distortions of Capra's record this Capra family-produced bio purveys as fact. For example: Capra's shrewd political decision to wangle his way onto the Academy board of governors in the early 1930s is avoided, though his presidency of the Academy is carefully presented after sequences showing his Best Director wins for "It Happened One Night" and "You Can't Take It With You." Capra was up to his neck in backstage Oscar politics by the time he grabbed the brass ring, and his record on labor issues (the Academy had arbitration authority in those days) was far more ambiguous than it is presented here. More importantly, his familiarity among the Academy's voting membership undoubtedly influenced his receipt of the trophies he so desperately sought, and which he probably deserved anyhow.

Then there's the matter of the House UnAmerican Activities Committee. To hear this film tell it, Capra was a '50s martyr of the McCarthyite inquisitors, whose period as a citizen under suspicion went out with a euphemism—the Red Channels clouds parting "not with a bang but with a whimper," as one of Capra's heavily featured sons puts it. But as BOXOFFICE contributor Joseph McBride proved in his groundbreaking Capra biography "Frank Capra: The Catastrophe of Success," that whimper was emitted by Capra himself, who eventually gave up "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" screenwriter Sidney Buchman to HUAC, along with other, less well-known Capra collaborators, in a secret session that ultimately saved his career.

The irony of course is that, like "Walt's," "Frank's" achievements need no gilding to be worthy of admiration, and even celebration. As this feature rightly points out, his films charted a far more complex and a much darker vision of American society and politics than is popularly believed. Copiously illustrated with clips from Capra's ouevre and by interviews with such unlikely admirers as Oliver Stone and Robert Altman, it is in the simultaneously haunted and consecrated faces of such Capra stars as Jimmy Stewart, Gary Cooper, Jean Arthur and Barbara Stanwyck as they enact Capra and Riskin's populist parables of triumph and despair that "Frank Capra's American Dream" ultimately finds its sought-for apotheosis.—Ray Greene

SQUEEZE ★★★

Starring Tyrone Burton and Eddie Cutanda. Directed and written by Robert Patton-Spruill. Produced by Garen Topalian, Stephanie Danan, Patricia Moreno and Arri Newman. A Miramax release. Drama. Rated R for strong violence, pervasive strong language and some drug content. Running time: 96 min.

Three 14-year-old friends, Tyson (an excellent Tyrone Burton), Hector (a poignant Eddie Cutanda) and Bao (Phuong Duong) attempt to survive into adulthood on the poverty-blighted, gang-controlled streets of Boston's Dorchester Fields. Trying to save these kids is J.J. (Geoffrey Rhue), an adult who runs a local youth collective. Starring at-risk kids who came through the media arts program of the Dorchester Youth Collective, and based on stories by D.Y.C. founder Emmett Folgert, "Squeeze" is the debut film of Robert Patton-Spruill. A few sequences (including a death) are clumsy and stedicam work occasionally too fast and close to follow, but most of "Squeeze" is visually solid, and an ethnically diverse cast creates intensity.—Karen Achenbach

NATIONAL NEWS

MOVIEFONE WINS $22 MILLION JUDGEMENT FROM PACER/CATS

An arbitration panel ordered ticketing systems manufacturer Pacer/CATS to pay a whopping $22.7 million to MovieFone, Inc. in a judgement based on MovieFone's claim that Pacer/CATS reneged on a 1992 contract to provide hardware to the phone ticketing company, which would have helped MovieFone to expand and improve its tele-ticketing operations.

The big post-judgement question is: who's going to pay? Key Pacer/CATS assets were acquired by ticketing giant (and MovieFone competitor) Ticketmaster in 1994, which rolled those assets into another entity, called CCS. MovieFone claims it was Ticketmaster's acquisition of Pacer/CATS assets and the rivalry between the two companies that caused Pacer/CATS to fail to honor its MovieFone commitments and that therefore Ticketmaster is liable. Ticketmaster claims it isn't responsible for any aspect of the judgement, since Pacer/CATS as a company is unrelated to Ticketmaster, and because no Ticketmaster executives were involved with or questioned during the arbitration.

A transcript of the three-member panel's decision appeared to support MovieFone's position. "Pacer/CATS materially breached and blatantly violated the agreement between the parties," the panel declared in part. "Pacer/CATS, Ticketmaster and [former Pacer/CATS parent] Wembley secretly entered into a transaction to strip Pacer/CATS of the resources necessary to perform its agreement with MovieFone and, under cover of this concealment, developed a common plan and purpose, the aim of which was to terminate the agreement and demolish the business."

The panel also declared that Ticketmaster's Pacer/CATS division CCS "is explicitly bound by its terms and liable for breaches that it committed, or were previously committed by Pacer/CATS." The panel pointed out that CCS "since its inception...has continued to do business under the same trade name and logo as Pacer/CATS, using the same personnel, office, phone number, stationery, business cards and other paraphernalia."

The $22.7 million judgement was decided upon to reimburse MovieFone for the development costs related to its own proprietary tele-ticketing system after Pacer/CATS faltered in its contractual obligations.

THE LION LANDS ORION, GOLDWYN

As Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc. finalized its deal to buy Orion Pictures and Goldwyn Entertainment Co. from Metromedia Intl. Group (MIG) to a tune of $573 million, it also gave out pink slips to Orion Pictures vice presidents Brad Krevoy and Steve Stabler, who are negotiating for a settlement of their five-year contracts with Metromedia. Reportedly a total of 85 Orion employees were terminated immediately, with approximately 136 employees to stay on during the transition, of whom 25—mostly the distribution executives—will be absorbed into the studio, while the rest will find their jobs eliminated over the next nine months. MGM plans keep the Goldwyn name as an art-film label. The fate of the 35-employee Goldwyn unit, including Goldwyn president Meyer Gottlieb, has yet to be determined.

MGM decided to acquire Orion and Goldwyn in order to more than double the size of its current library. The 2,200-title library from Orion and Goldwyn includes "Dances With Wolves" and "The Silence of the Lambs" and now gives MGM "the largest modern film library in the world," according to MGM chairman and CEO Frank Mancuso. The library is expected to significantly enhance the studio's operating cash flow. Some industry insiders say it puts MGM in a better position for a possible initial public offering. MGM added almost all of the 10 acquired completed films from MIG to its practically empty release slate.

INDIE EXECUTIVE SHUFFLE

Call it the independent executive exchange program, but the shuffle at Miramax, October Films and Live Entertainment is keeping everyone on their toes. Miramax senior vice president Scott Greenstein, often referred to as the third Weinstein, left Miramax in June and was taken on board at October Films to replace co-managing executive Amir Malin, who left October to take a top spot at Live Entertainment.

Live, which was recently acquired by an investors group headed by Bain Capital and Richland Gordon & Co., named Malin co-president in charge of domestic and international film distribution, and announced its full top team: Live chairman Roger Burlage remains in place along with two new executives—Mark A. Curcio, former head of Bain's Los Angeles office, was named CEO, and Bill Block, former head of West Coast operations for talent agency International Creative Management, was named co-president. Neither Curcio nor Block has any previous film production or film company experience.

Miramax, meanwhile, promoted Steven Hutensky to senior VP of business and legal affairs and Andrew Herwitz to senior VP of acquisitions and business affairs. Greenstein will join with October's other co-managing executives Bingham Ray and John Schmidt. Bain had bid on taking over October (before Universal acquired a majority interest in the indie) and Malin was known to be intrigued by the potential of Live's 2,000-title library.

AMC IN PLANET HOLLYWOOD ORBIT

Planet Hollywood International, Inc. and AMC Entertainment announced a joint venture to develop and operate an integrated moviegoing, dining and retail concept under the branded name Planet Movies by AMC.

The 50/50 partnership will be responsible for the creation and marketing of themed environments combining AMC megaplexes with Planet Hollywood restaurants as well as other dining, retail and movie-related outlets. The venture plans to open complexes worldwide; to kick things off, seven existing AMC 'plexes encompassing 150 AMC screens will be adapted to the Planet Movies concept. The re-branded locations include AMC's Pleasure Island 24-plex in Orlando, Fla., which is located across the street from Planet Hollywood's most successful restaurant and retail unit.

The co-venture will own and operate all subsequent units, including eight to 10 new complexes with a total screen count between 200 to 250, which are to be built in the next 18 to 24 months. After that, Planet Movies anticipates rolling out new facilities at the rate of five to 10 sites per year.

MR. VALENTI GOES TO MOSCOW

Jack Valenti, chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) and chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association (MPA), announced the appointment of Simon Barsky to the post of senior vice president and general counsel of both the MPAA and its international counterpart, the MPA. Barsky, who has been with the MPAA since 1978, will oversee all of the associations' legal affairs worldwide.

However, Valenti will continue to be involved with one of the most prominent international legal affairs affecting the industry: the ongoing battle against the piracy of U.S. films in foreign countries. Trade war threats against major offenders such as China have loomed for months as an ultimatum to incite action to solve the problem.

In July, Jack Valenti departed for Moscow to meet with a number of the country's high-ranking government officials on the issue of piracy. Russia is one of the largest markets in the world for pirated U.S. films, accounting for an estimated annual revenue loss of $300 million. Upon arrival in Moscow, Valenti met with the Russian audiovisual industry and launched the Russian Anti-Piracy Organization, a new joint initiative to fight piracy. As Valenti pointed out in a statement, "Piracy steals from us all. Nikita Mikhalkov's award-winning 'Burnt by the Sun' and Andrei Konchalovsky's new work 'The Odyssey' are just two examples of Russian works to suffer in pirates' hands."

AU REVOIR, RYSHER

After three years in motion picture production, a series of boxoffice losses has prompted Rysher Entertainment to pull out of the movie industry. It will focus exclusively on TV operations, phasing out all theatrical production activities. The move will result in the elimination of about 40 jobs. CEO Tim Helfet said in a July 8 meeting that Rysher had lost money on its theatrical product, having never managed to score a major boxoffice hit. The company suffered substantial losses on the MGM/UA-distributed "Turbulence," which cost nearly $60 million to make but grossed only $11.5 million domestically, and "The Evening Star," distributed through Paramount, which grossed $12.5 million and resulted in losses of more than $30 million. The total cost to Rysher's parent company, Atlanta-based Cox Enterprises, is estimated at $200 million.

Other Rysher projects to bomb were "House Arrest," "Exit to Eden" and "Destiny Turns on the Radio," while the company's hits included "Private Parts," "Primal Fear" and "Big Night." Rysher will produce one more film, "Eugene Onegin," starring Ralph Fiennes and Liv Tyler.

EXHIBITION BRIEFINGS

A STAR IS BORN IN SOUTHFIELD

Star Theatres has opened the 20-screen, all stadium seating, all-THX approved Star Southfield Entertainment Centre in Southfield, Mich., and it's already setting records. On its opening weekend, June 20-22, the Star Southfield had the highest attendance in the country, with nearly 45,000 patrons coming through the theatre's doors. It was the second highest grossing theatre for the opening weekend of "Batman & Robin," and the highest grossing theatre for the July 4 opening weekend of "Men In Black," with 55,000 attendees.

The Star Southfield's two largest auditoriums have 700 seats each; total seating capacity is 6,000. The 185,000-square-foot complex has three themed areas: the "Historic Detroit Lobby," "Hollywood Boulevard" and "Hollywood Soundstage." The centerpiece of the central concession stand is a 20-foot-tall bucket of popcorn with basketball-sized popcorn kernels that actually pop into the air. The theatre's unique design even features sky ceilings with cloud machines.

Star Theatres, based in Grand Rapids, Mich., is run by Loews co-chairs Jim and Barrie Loeks, and is a partnership between Loeks Michigan Theatres and Sony Retail Entertainment. It operates 82 screens in eight locations throughout Michigan.

SIGNATURE STYLE

Signature Theatres has opened its flagship Hawaiian movie theatre, the Signature Pearl Highlands 12. The 12-screen, 2,500-seat theatre offers all three digital sound systems—DTS, Dolby Digital and SDDS—as well as stadium-style seating and plush high-back chairs with cupholders. Founded in 1996, Signature already owns and operates more than 100 screens in Northern California and Hawaii.

CROWN'S SCREEN COUNT REACHES NEW APEX

Connecticut-based Crown Theatres is purchasing Apex Cinemas, a 24-screen circuit based in Annapolis, Md. This will bring the total number of screens Crown owns and operates to 67. A new 16-screen megaplex in Annapolis, a 14-plex in Brooklyn, N.Y., and a six-screen expansion of the Crown Marquis 10 in Trumbull, Conn., are also in the works. The circuit also has sites in development in Queens, N.Y.; Elizabeth, N.J.; Cherry Hill, N.J.; Exton, Penn.; and Miami, Fla.

CHRISTIE ACQUIRES WESTREX

Christie Inc., a manufacturer and distributor of motion picture theatre projection equipment, has purchased the Westrex Electronic Film Projector product line. Westrex manufactures 35mm and 70mm projectors for special venue applications, including large format theatres, motion simulator rides, and 3-D and multiple projector theatres. This move is part of Christie's strategy to expand into the special venue market. "We are extremely happy about the acquisition as special venues are an expanding market that we have been interested in pursuing for some time," says Christie's executive VP and COO Jack Kline. "Westrex is a known leader in the industry...The marriage of the two companies will allow us to work as a cohesive unit to extend our leadership position." Westrex's manufacturing operations have moved from Simi Valley, Calif., to Christie's headquarters in Cypress, Calif.

DOLBY RECEIVES BAFTA AWARD

On the heels of announcing the sale of more than 2,500 digital processors over the first six months of 1997, Dolby Laboratories was recently selected by the British Academy of Film and Television Arts to receive a Special Technical Award to mark the company's "outstanding technical achievements in film and sound." Dr. Ray Dolby, founder and chairman of Dolby Laboratories, accepted the award at a ceremony in London on July 9.

EXPANDING UPON HERITAGE

Cecil L. George, president of Altus, Okla.-based Heritage Park Theatres, announced plans to add three screens to their existing five-plex in Altus, Okla. Heritage Park will also add two screens to its four-plex in Elk City, Okla., and in early 1998, the company will build a six-plex in Pampa, Texas.

WB INTL. PACTS WITH PEPSI

Warner Bros. International Theatres and Pepsico Inc. have entered into a multi-year deal under which Pepsi products will be served exclusively in all Warner Bros. International cinemas. That entails 358 screens in 43 theatres in six countries: the United Kingdom, Spain, Germany, Portugal, Italy and Japan. Promotional tie-ins and lobby merchandising campaigns are also in the works to cross-promote both companies.

SHOWMANDISER PROMOTION OF THE MONTH

Bill McDaniel, promotions manager for the Star Gratiot Theatre in Clinton Township, Mich., created a hilarious mock-tabloid to promote his theatre's screenings of the sci-fi blockbuster "Men In Black." The cover features a headline proclaiming an alien invasion, illustrated with a photo of a spaceship flying over the Star Gratiot. Spoofs of alien abduction stories and other sensationalistically humorous articles ran in the four-page flyer, including the Pop and Popcorn diet "guaranteed to work wonders!" (with a typical tabloid-type disclaimer noting that the claim is, of course, "NOT A GUARANTEE"). A coupon for a free soda during "MIB's" opening weekend was also included. The publication was distributed for free at the theatre's boxoffice and area businesses for two weeks prior to the film's release.

ON THE MOVE

United Cinemas International (UCI), an overseas multiplex co-venture between Paramount and Universal, has appointed David Poveda as operations and business development director of UCI Brasil. UCI Brasil's first theatre is scheduled to open this month...Hoyts Cinemas Corp. has named Jud Parker senior executive vice president of film...Lynn Shubert, a past president of the ITEA and former VP of the theatre division of Christie Electric Corp., has been retained as principal consultant to spearhead Miller & Kreisel Sound Corp. (M&K)'s launch of their new THX-approved Multichannel Pro Solutions line of monitors and powered subwoofers into the exhibition market...Mari Barnum, head of Exhibitor Relations for Fox, is leaving her position after 16 years with the studio. Barnum said she would spend some time with her family and then explore a new career path.

Q&A: GET SMART: VINCE LUCIANI NAMED PRESIDENT

SMART Theatre Systems, manufacturer of cinema sound products, has long known about finding a niche and filling it. While DTS, Dolby and Sony battle for leadership in the digital realm, SMART continues to focus much of its manufacturing and marketing muscle on product for the many theatres that use analog sound equipment, as well as devices that complement digital equipment. SMART's latest strategy is to increase its international presence, particularly in Eastern Europe, where analog sound-equipped theatres are predominant. This moves sees Norm Schneider take the role of chief executive officer, spending most of his time focusing on that market. Assuming the position of president is Vince Luciani, a former engineer at SMART who spent a few years at Panasonic's Car Audio department before returning to head domestic sales and production at the company that first hired him right out of college.

BOXOFFICE: What does this new executive structure say about the direction in which SMART is headed?

VINCE LUCIANI: SMART is concentrating on the international market. I was brought in to take care of domestic sales and manufacturing. It will free up Norm, who has moved up to CEO, to concentrate on the international market, spending a lot of time in Eastern Europe. We're trying to stake our claim over in Europe.

BOXOFFICE: What is it about that market that appeals to SMART?

LUCIANI: [SMART's product] is mainly at this point in time an analog soundtrack audio system. We are not in the position to set forth with a new digital format. Since we are an analog house, and the U.S. is going a lot towards digital, we feel Eastern Europe is still running a lot of analog prints, and that's a good market there.

BOXOFFICE: How will the growing digitalization impact SMART's business in the future?

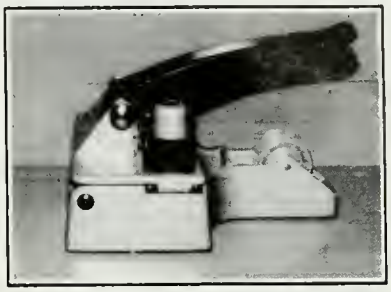
LUCIANI: While the digital formats are fighting it out to see who's going to gain dominance in the industry, SMART is always going to be there for analog backup. If another "Jurassic Park" comes out and it's only available in DTS and your theatre only has Dolby Digital playback, then SMART is going to be there for you to play the analog backup track. So that's basically the game that we're playing. And also, we are expanding our product line to include more than just sound equipment. We have just launched a a very flexible system for booth automation that includes both the projector side and the sound side and the lights and masking and lens changes—it does everything. So with those products, we're trying to widen our product base.

BOXOFFICE: What new SMART product are you most excited about?

LUCIANI: Probably the MOD VI. I would put it in the realm of revolutionary. Because what we're doing for a suggested retail price of $2,000 is what everyone else is currently doing in the $4,000 to $6,000 range. It's still a full-featured analog processor, but, since it is so low-cost, it allows you to add digital really easily.

BOXOFFICE: What kind of specialized product lines is SMART currently selling or developing for the specialized needs of overseas exhibitors?

LUCIANI: We are putting together a package. The package includes a MOD VI, a new low-cost monitor, and a six-channel amplifier. We're packaging that in a 21-inch rack, and we're including speakers, everything complete. Our European customers do not have the ability that we do here in the States, where you can buy speakers from one guy, amps from one guy, and processors from another guy, because all this importing is very difficult. So they want to have one-stop shopping for their sound systems.



BOXOFFICE: I understand you were with SMART a few years ago, and are just now returning to SMART as president.

LUCIANI: That's right. Out of college, I went to graduate school here in Atlanta, and I heard about SMART through a co-worker where I was doing some intern work. Within a week, I came over and visited SMART and decided that's where I wanted to work. Being an audio person, going to school in audio, I thought this was the perfect place for me. So I came here directly out of school and worked here for about two and a half years. After that, I thought that it was good to get a perspective of business from a large company, and Panasonic's car audio division had an opening. By day I would work for Panasonic, but at night I would come back to SMART and continue to do design work for them. I moonlighted with SMART for about four and a half years of the six years that I was gone. So I kept up with SMART quite a bit, because I had a feeling in the back of my mind that I might come back here some day. I knew that SMART was the kind of organization that I wanted to be with.

BOXOFFICE: What sort of unique impression would you hope to make on SMART?

LUCIANI: I guess what I would like my mark to be is to open up a new market for us. I hope that I can diversify us, and open other markets up that may not necessarily be in the theatre industry. Of course, SMART will always be in the theatre industry, and we will always support our current product line, and we will always do active research and development in that area. [New markets] will probably be in the audio realm. Basically, SMART is an audio house, an analog audio house. And we will continue to try to make better sound. Because that's what we do. And there's sound in many, many different fields. So who knows where you might see the SMART Devices logo pop up in the future.—Christine James

EUROVIEWS

European News Notes by Melissa Morrison

LEAD STORY: CINEMA EXPO '97 WRAP-UP

AMSTERDAM—The sixth edition of the exhibition trade fair Cinema Expo International ran June 29 - July 2 at Amsterdam's RAI convention center. Titles screened for exhibitors included Buena Vista International's "Face/Off," Warner Bros.' "Batman & Robin," Fox's "Volcano" and "Speed 2: Cruise Control" as well as UIP's "The Lost World: Jurassic Park." MGM was also on hand to assure exhibitors that "Tomorrow Never Dies" will be delivered on time. Polygram pushed to prove they are a major player with a screening of "Bean" and an appearance by "Bean" star Rowan Atkinson, who was presented with the Cinema Expo award for excellence in comedy.

Other awardees included Luc Besson ("The Fifth Element"), who received the excellence in filmmaking award; 20th Century Fox International's Jim Gianopulos, honored as distributor of the year; and Decatron's Albert Bert, who won the exhibitor of the year award. Disney's Peter Schneider accepted the creative achievement award for himself and Roy E. Disney (who was absent due to a leg fracture from a car accident). Producer Saul Zaentz ("The English Patient"), who received the first Albert R. Broccoli Award for excellence as a producer, praised the award's namesake, the producer of the James Bond movies, for creating a series of films with artistic merit that has also enjoyed worldwide commercial success for over 35 years.

Talk at this year's Cinema Expo was over expansion into underdeveloped Italy and the fact that few French exhibitors attended due to this year's Cinema Expo event clashing with France's three day "Fete Du Cinema," a popular sales-boosting campaign that offers moviegoers substantially reduced ticket prices (see "Summer Selling Successes," next page). Next year's Cinema Expo hopes to avoid such a conflict and is scheduled to run June 15-19, 1998.

PATHE, CANAL PLUS UNITE EUROPEAN DISTRIBUTORS

PARIS—Two major French players have spearheaded the formation of a theatrical network that will effectively control Europe-wide rights to U.S. independent films and give American producers a new, powerful source of funding. The Canal Plus television giant and Pathe theatrical distributor and exhibitor announced in May at Cannes that the new venture would involve the cooperation of partners in the United Kingdom, Germany, Spain and Italy—in other words, about 85 percent of Western Europe. The new group would acquire films for these countries in one fell swoop, rather than the usual method of licensing films region-by-region. The other participating distributors are the UK's Guild Pathe, Germany's Tobis Filmkunst, Spain's Sogepaq, as well as France's AMLF. Either Italy's Medusa or Cecchi Gori is also expected to participate. In return for getting rights to American independent films, the group will invest up to $30 million in making them, allowing U.S. producers to acquire financing with the promise of direct sales in most of Europe. A Canal Plus spokesman said the group would target middle-budget films and currently had $10 million to $30 million to invest. That amounts to about one to three films annually. The rights agreement will also cover video and pay-TV. The new project is not the first one Pathe and Canal Plus have collaborated on in the name of European domination: The two also joined forces earlier this year to compete for—and win—a coveted UK Lottery franchise, a sort of mini-studio meant to strengthen the British film industry (see "Clearing A Pathe for British Filmmakers," this page).

CLEARING A PATHE FOR BRITISH FILMMAKERS

LONDON—Pathe Pictures, a winner of one of the revolutionary British film franchises, is making good on its pledge to fund first-time filmmakers. The consortium, headed by the French distribution and exhibition behemoth, received $53.4 million, the largest segment of the $149 million awarded to three groups by the Arts Council of England in May. As part of its bid for the franchise, Pathe Pictures promised to create a fund dedicated to producing one movie annually by a new director for the six years of the franchise's life span. The effort is seen as part of Pathe's expansion into pan-European ventures, and British film's recent renaissance makes it prime hunting ground. Other members of Pathe Pictures' consortium, which is supposed to act as a mini-studio, include Canal Plus, Thin Man Films, Allied Films, Pandora Productions, Fragile Films, and Imagine Films (which includes the output of director Mike Leigh, whose Oscar- and Cannes-lauded "Secrets and Lies" is partially responsible for British film's boom). The other two consortiums are the Film Consortium and DNA Films. Pathe Pictures' films will be distributed in the United Kingdom by Pathe Distribution, formerly Guild Pathe Cinema.

IT TAKES A VILLAGE

LONDON—Warner Village Cinemas is planning to build London's first megaplex, a 32-screen, 200,000-square-foot 8,200 seat theatre that will be the largest cinema complex in Europe. The exhibitor is also discussing the possibility of eventually using the $56 million megaplex, converted from the Battersea Power Station and scheduled for completion in the year 2000, for the newly reconfigured London Film Festival (which hopes to become Cannes' rival in size and importance) planned for launch in fall 1998. The compound will also contain production and post-production space, a hotel, restaurants and apartments.

Also in the works for Warner Village Cinemas is a megaplex in the city of Birmingham that would have 30 screens and 6,000 seats.

Warner Village Cinemas, a joint venture between Warner Bros. International Theatres and Australia's Village Roadshow International, announced in April its intention to invest a total of $16 million into British cinemas. If realized, its expansion plans would make it the largest exhibitor in the United Kingdom. Currently, it is number four.

INTERNATIONAL AMUSEMENTS

PAISLEY, ENGLAND—U.S.-based National Amusements opened its latest Showcase Cinema on June 12 in Paisley, England. Known as The Phoenix, the state-of-the-art 14-screen, 3,800 seat movie palace joins 14 other United Kingdom theatres operated by National Amusements. Less than a month earlier, National Amusements unveiled London's first Showcase Cinema, located in Newham. The 14-screen, 4,000 seat movie palace boasts a decidedly American atmosphere, with an art gallery of famous Golden Age Hollywood stars and movie stills; a neon sculpture tribute to Hollywood; and a cinema store selling film-related merchandise. The Phoenix shares these features, as well as a coming attractions video wall, a video game room and an expanded concession counter that offers ice cream sundaes. National Amusements has 156 screens in the U.K. and more than 1,100 worldwide.

SUMMER SELLING SUCCESSES

After the success of last year's summer movie campaigns such as Germany's Der Sommerhit: Kino (a collaboration among distributors, exhibitors and media to promote summer movies), a slew of other European countries have decided to try similar tactics to goose the traditionally slack season. Denmark spent $350,000 on a bug-thened campaign—"coming soon to a garden near you"—presumably designed to encourage Danes to take refuge from nature's pests inside cinemas. Norway gave away tickets to matinee screenings in its bars and restaurants. The U.K. launched its National Cinema Day (June 15) with reduced ticket prices. France enlarged its Fete du Cinema from one to three days, running June 29 to July . A $6 pass allowed French cinemagoers to see any film for the discount price of $1.70. And in Iceland, the industry added a twist to its summer campaign by appealing to tourists, distributing booklets advertising the country's English-language films to passengers on the cruise ships that dock in local harbors.

Germany's Der Sommerhit: Kino, launched last year at a cost of $20 million, increased ticket sales by 19 percent.

NORWAY'S SHORT SUBJECT

OSLO—A Norwegian distributor and major exhibitor are reviving the short-film genre in the country, with the help of the Norwegian film institute. Europafilm and Oslo Cinemas have started a subscription service in which exhibitors paying an annual fee have access to any of Europafilm's short films. Currently, Europafilm carries three-quarters of the 200 short films produced in Norway, as well as many foreign ones, including Aardman Animation's Wallace and Gromit adventure "A Close Shave." Such films generally are seen only on the festival circuit, but the Norwegian team is taking advantage of a local law that allows exhibitors to show short films tax-free. The annual subscription fee ranges from $400 to $2,500, depending on the size of the cinema. Since 1994, the Norwegian Film Institute has provided funding for producing films for Europafilm's short-film library. Europafilm approaches screenwriters and directors to make the films and takes care of post-production, prints and other costs. Approximately 60 percent of Norwegian cinemas screen short films.

Q&A: FRENCH PRODUCER HUMBERT BALSAN ON GOLF AND FILM

French producer Humbert Balsan has always lived on the creative end of the arts—as an actor (most notably in Robert Bresson's "Lancelot du Lac") and as a documentary director. In 1979, Balsan joined Ismail Merchant and James Ivory, and over the years has produced several of their films, including "Quartet," "Jefferson in Paris," "Surviving Picasso" and "The Proprietor." Balsan's 1996 film "Will it Snow for Christmas?" received both boxoffice and critical success, and won a Cesar—France's version of an Oscar—for its director, Sandrine Veysset. With 35 features produced through his company, Ognon Pictures, Balsan spoke to BOXOFFICE about his determination to protect the vision of his directors, many of them first-timers, and his plans for distributing his films stateside.

BOXOFFICE: Is it fair to call you one of the more successful producers in France today?

HUMBERT BALSAN: I play golf. In film production, like in golf, you have to be modest. You can say I had a series of successes this year. One was with a film called "Will it Snow for Christmas?" [on which Sandrine Veysset made her directorial debut], a very big success in France, Switzerland and Belgium. Then we had two films do very well in Cannes—"Destiny," directed by Youssef Chahine, and "Post-Coitum, Animal Triste" [the first directorial effort of French actress Brigitte Rouan]. Both of these films were very well received and are being sold in many territories.

BOXOFFICE: What is your experience with United States distribution?

BALSAN: I've never had a big hit [in the U.S.] like I had in France with "Will It Snow For Christmas?" It was my biggest financial success. I made the film for a low cost and I had 100 percent of the negative because I didn't need to have co-producers. It was not the biggest hit in terms of seats in France [800,000 admissions in 6 months] but if you look at the ratio of cost to results, it's very, very big.

Theatres have to be booked properly and not show a comedy one day, and the next day a film of Godard. Theatres have to have a certain consistency.

BOXOFFICE: Do you plan to open a distribution arm of Ognon Pictures stateside?

BALSAN: My idea is to have a structure in the States that carefully follows my films and releases some of them. I've often been close to having a deal in the States but it has never happened, though always for different reasons. I think it is now the right time to concentrate on this. We have some good contacts with people, particularly Donald Rosenfeld, who worked with Merchant/Ivory for 10 years, and who is now on his own.

BOXOFFICE: How do you plan to reach a stateside market?

BALSAN: This has always been the big problem with the States. The United States is a great country for films, but it's also very protectionist. That's why I think if I take care of my own films, there's more motivation and then more work [accomplished]. Getting to screens is a problem. I think we'll come to the point of buying some theatres and releasing our films here in our own theaters. But it's the same in France. I always had difficulty getting access to the good theatres in France. I think there is a huge audience for interesting films in the States. It's just a matter of being there at the right time and working out a certain line of films to build a relationship with an audience so they will be faithful to the theatre. Theatres have to be booked properly and not show a comedy one day, and the next day a film of Godard. Theatres have to have a certain consistency. Exhibitors in the States have been doing this for many years but maybe it's not enough. There are so many films from around the world that exhibitors can't show everything. So the competition is very hard in this market for access to the good theatres.

BOXOFFICE: Would your exhibition strategy include building multiplexes here?

BALSAN: No, not at all. I would build art-houses. I'm an "artisan," as we say in French. For a producer, that means there's a certain spirit and a way of being very independent and doing things at a very human scale. I believe that cinema is closer to art than to industry. So I don't think you can be totally artistically oriented if you are doing production at a scale that's too big.

BOXOFFICE: You once said that what you require of your directors is authenticity.

BALSAN: I'm the kind of producer who doesn't try to push a director to do films to please investors. I push directors to make the film that's inside them. It's not always so easy, but I realized over the years that it's often in having a low budget that we can do this the most.—Karen Achenbach

LEAD STORY: AMC ENTERS CANADA'S EXHIBITION MARKET

Long rumored to become part of Canada's exhibition scene, AMC Theatres, through its Canadian subsidiary, AMC Theatres of Canada, is set to make its mark in Toronto, where it will anchor a major retail entertainment center. The Canadian-owned and operated PenEquity Management Corp., a designer and developer of large-scale real estate projects, has been selected by the city of Toronto to design an entertainment retail center on the corner of Yonge Street and Dundas Street East. The center, to be called Metropolis, will contain fashion outlets, themed restaurants and a music superstore, and will be anchored by a 115,000-square-foot AMC 30-plex with 6,000 seats. That would make it the city's largest multiplex. Says Harry Peckham, director of corporate business development for AMC Theatres of Canada, "We are thrilled to be part of this spectacular entertainment retail development, which will most certainly become the jewel of Toronto." Groundbreaking on the 270,000-square-foot, C$90 million (US$64.8 million) Metropolis will take place in spring of 1998. The center is scheduled to open in summer of 1999.

The AMC 30-plex is part of a massive theatrical expansion in Toronto's downtown area: Cineplex Odeon is adding nine screens to its dual Varsity cinemas, and Famous Players is erecting a major multiplex downtown as well.

AMC is also constructing a 30-plex in Montreal; that theatre will also anchor an urban entertainment center.

TORONTO FEST FILMS ANNOUNCED

Atom Egoyan's Cannes prize winner, "The Sweet Hereafter," will kick off the Opening Gala at the 22nd edition of the Toronto International Film Festival, which runs Sept. 4-13. The festival traditionally opens with a Canadian film.

Also at the fest will be the world premiere of "Mrs. Dalloway," the new film from Marleen Gorris ("Antonia's Line"), based on Virginia Woolf's novel and starring Vanessa Redgrave. North American premieres in Toronto will include Curtis Hanson's "L.A. Confidential"; Gilles MacKinnon's "Regeneration"; and Vera Belmont's "Marquise." The spotlight director at Toronto this year will be French director Benoit Jacquot; his most recent film, "Le Septieme Ciel," will also have its North American premiere at the fest. Balkan cinema will be spotlighted as well, and a new section called The Masters will present films from acclaimed talents such as Jean-Luc Godard and Lars Von Trier.

RENEWED "ALLIANCE" WITH MIRAMAX

Miramax Films has renewed its distribution agreement with Canadian distributor Alliance Releasing. Alliance expects to release some 80 Miramax films under the agreement. Recent Alliance pickups from Miramax that have been successful in Canada have included "The English Patient," "Trainspotting," "Sling Blade" and "Kolya." Alliance, which is Canada's largest distributor, also has an output deal with New Line.

FAMOUS: WHAT COMES A"ROUND" GOES AROUND

Famous Players' newest multiplex, the 10-screen Coliseum, located in the Toronto suburb of Mississauga, was the top-grossing theatre in Canada its opening weekend in May, taking in more than C$200,000. Its C$24,000 gross for the Andy Garcia film "Night Falls on Manhattan" was the third highest in North America. The Coliseum boasts a unique design, in which its 10 auditoriums are housed in a circular building (hence the theatre's name).

HOLLYWOOD COMES TO MONTREAL

The Brian De Palma film "Snake Eyes," shooting in Montreal this summer, marks a resurgence of American filming in that city. As recently as 1992, there were no American films shot in Montreal. Now, the city's estimated 1997 total film production of C$525 million, bolstered by the U.S. presence there, brings it very close to leader Toronto's C$530 million. (While "Snake Eyes'" budget is estimated at C$115 million, the 35 Quebecois features to be shot this year will cumulatively cost only C$75-80 million.)

There will be 15 American features shot in Montreal this year alone. The change has come about, says Andre Lafond, City of Montreal film commissioner, as a result of a concerted effort to get foreign productions to shoot in Montreal. "We established a consortium of the industry—actors, producers, the city of Montreal, almost everybody." This is a departure from the early '90s, when the attitude on the part of Francophone Quebec, based on protectionist concerns, was dismissive of American producers. "They always looked at U.S. producers as invaders, [and thought that it was] risky to attract too many foreign producers," says Lafond. Now, attracting foreigners is good business, he says. "We need new money, bigger volume in the system, to keep prices and fees low and competitive."

IDENTITY CRISIS: FEST VS. FEST

The Montreal World Film Festival is suing the Montreal International Festival of Cinema and New Media for C$5 million (US$3.6 million) on the grounds that the smaller festival is infringing on its identity. The suit states that the Festival of Cinema and New Media has been trying to steal films already committed to the World Film Festival, and that its name is too similar to the giant Montreal fest. Formerly the Montreal Festival of New Cinema and Video, the festival moved from a post-World Film Festival slot to an early summer date that precedes the World Film Festival by two months. The Festival of Cinema and New Media has traditionally been seen as the edgier, more avant garde festival of the two.

ON THE MOVE

Judy Holm has been promoted to the position of vice president, theatrical distribution for Polygram Entertainment Canada. Holm, formerly Polygram's director of theatrical marketing, will be responsible for expanding Polygram's marketing division into a full-integrated theatrical distribution arm.

Malofilm Communications has announced the appointment of Andy Myers as vice president and managing director of Malofilm Distribution. Myers was previously the longtime VP and general manager of Norstar Entertainment.

And Famous Players has announced that Dennis Kucherawy will assume the title of director, corporate public relations for the company. He will be responsible for information liaison between Famous Players and the public, and will be heavily involved in Famous Players' theatrical chain expansion. Kucherawy leaves Livent Inc., where he was vice president of communications.

PACIFIC OVERTURES

NOTES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM by Susan Lambert

LEAD STORY: MAJORS INVESTIGATION ANNOUNCED AT INDIE'S CONFERENCE

SYDNEY— The National Association of Theater Owners (NATO) held an inaugural conference June 17-18 for Australia's independent theatre owners in order to discuss issues specifically appropriate to independents, particularly issues of film rental terms and better allocation of distributors' publicity resources. Intended to augment the Australian Movie Convention, between 70 to 100 exhibitors reportedly attended the event, held in Bowral of southern New South Wales.

At the conference, the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC), Australia's antitrust watchdog, announced its investigation into the exhibition and distribution sectors of the film industry. ACCC chairman Allan Asher said they were persuaded to investigate by the number of complaints received. Main concerns are anti-competitive behavior by the major circuits—Hoyts, Greater Union and Village Roadshow—and distributors—Village Roadshow Films (VRF, which handles Warner Bros. and Disney releases), UIP (which handles Paramount, Universal and MGM releases), Columbia TriStar and 20th Century Fox. Other concerns are the use of market strength to create monopolization and barriers to new competitors, as well as collusion and consumer protection. The ACCC also expressed concern that agency and joint-venture arrangements in film distribution led to a manipulation of release dates to prevent opening-week competition among titles.

The common complain by the independents, many of whom feel they are being squeezed out of the marketplace, is over inflexible film rental terms, unrealistic terms for second-run films and minimum exhibition periods. Other complaints include a refusal by distributors to supply prints and inconsistent treatment by distributors. The ACCC will seek to clarify if the complaints stem from unlawful conduct on the companies' actions or a change in the economic structure of the industry. Asher did note there was no real ticket pricing competition between the majors except when a major was competing against an independent theatre and commented that when it is harder to enter into an industry, it is easier for those in the market to behave in an anti-competitive way. He added, "If sustainable, legitimate explanations are given, it's unlikely that a court will find them in breach of the Trade Practices Act." The ACCC investigation is expected to take 10 weeks.

'IRATING PROTECTION

HONG KONG—Just before Hong Kong returned to Chinese ule on midnight June 30th, the democratically elected legislature astily enacted copyright enforcement legislation, after a year of obbying by Hong Kong filmmakers for tougher criminal penalties gainst pirateers and illegal importers of films, videos and music, vhich are putting a big dent into the already ailing Hong Kong film ndustry. Actor/filmmaker Jackie Chan led a protest march with ther Hong Kong film stars and directors to persuade the govern- ent to push for harsher restrictions and better enforcement. The ew law makes it easier to investigate and prosecute copyright nfringement and calls for stricter penalties, ranging up to eight ears in prison and HK$500,000 (US$65,000) in fines. It remains o be seen if the Chinese government, which this past year began a rackdown on its own pirating problem, will abide by any of the ıws enacted by the previous government.

'HILIPPINES DEVELOP FILM BOARD

MANILA—Meanwhile, in the Philippines, industry leaders also ook their battle to the Senate, which drafted a bill for the creation f a Film Development Board under the office of the President. The oard would be involved in boosting production of quality films nd increasing the strength of the local industry. Other functions ould include holding local and international film festivals, setting p training programs and establishing various incentive programs or quality Philippine films. The board would be comprised of the eads of the Film Academy of the Philippines, Cultural Center of ıe Philippines and Directors Guild of the Philippines along with oted film director Carlos Signuon-Reyna.

CHINA'S FIRST CINEMA CIRCUIT

BEIJING—China Film, the country's monopoly film importer, has established China's first national cinema circuit, comprising the top 300 cinemas in the country's 15 leading markets. Called the Zhonghua Theatres, the chain is more an alliance than a registered business and is based on previous contractual relationships between China Film Distribution and Exhibition Association and the theatres over the release of foreign blockbusters.

The circuit was formed with the intention of providing a guaranteed forum for releasing domestic product in conjunction with foreign films. The 300 theatres will have first run of 12 "priority" Chinese films and 10 Hollywood films each year, and the theatres will be required to give the Chinese films at least a seven-day booking. The film that launched the Zhonghua alliance in June is "The Opium War." A historical epic by director Xie Jin, "The Opium War" is said to be the biggest-budgeted film in China's history at 100 million yuan ($12.5 million) and is being jointly distributed, in a profit-sharing distribution arrangement, by China Film and the film's producer, Sichauam "Opium War" Film and TV Production Corp. Ltd. In order to join the Zhonghua chain, theatres had to meet an annual boxoffice total: In large cities, theatres must have at least 1 million yuan ($125,000) in annual revenue, and medium-size city theatres are required to have over 500,000 yuan ($62,500) in boxoffice totals.

In other news, the recently established Forbidden City Film Co. announced that its first film, "Since the Days of Lei Feng," a co-production with Beijing Youth Film Studio, has done exceptionally well at the boxoffice. The story of China's cultural revolution hero and his devotion to the cause of socialism has passed the 5 million yuan ($635,000) mark in Beijing alone. Forbidden City, which started up April 9, is comprised of a venture among China's second largest network, Beijing Television, its affiliate, Beijing Television Arts Center, the Beijing Municipal Film Co. and Beijing Cultural Audio-Visual Publishing.

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

The Big Picture

In calling his dark period novel on '50s movieland corruption "L.A. Confidential," mystery writer James Ellroy got it right. Back in the supposedly placid 1950s, Confidential Magazine was every studio publicist's worst nightmare—the tinseltown tattler, ready to go to any sleazy extreme to tell the trashy truth about the sacred cows and tinhorn idols of the movie elite.

For decades, the Hollywood powers that be had kept a lid on the often scandalous off-screen antics of the glamorous young millionaires who made up the movie colony. Mindful of the destructive controversies of the '20s (the Fatty Arbuckle manslaughter case, the death by overdose of "all-American" actor Wallace Reid, the kinky revelations accompanying the unsolved murder of director William Desmond Taylor), the film bosses had taken steps by the early '30s to control every aspect of their top stars' public images. The founding of the Hayes Office and the institution of Hollywood's first production code kept movie content from offending the tender sensibilities of the American public, while a complex and powerful network of industry flacks orchestrated carefully stage-managed public appearances for the Hollywood talent pool, calculated to make some of the most notorious hedonists in American history seem like nothing more nor less than exemplars of the mainstream Middle American value system who got lucky and made good.

Confidential changed all that. The brainchild of Robert Harrison, a former adman for the now-defunct Motion Picture Daily, and A.P. Govoni, a sometime editor for the National Police Gazette, Confidential took the Hearstian "yellow journalism" approach pioneered in such outlets as The New York Graphic and The Los Angeles Mirror and applied it in full-throttle, lunge-for-the-jugular fashion against the cream of the Filmtown crop. Journalistic ethics were loose at best: In addition to "sourcing" the usual crowd of industry hangers-on with an ax to grind, Confidential deployed its own network of private detectives, including the notorious Fred Otash, a former L.A. cop who became legendary within the Hollywood community for his implacable exposure of the most intimate details of celebrity misbehavior, both public and private.

Pay-offs to movietown hookers were commonplace, and Confidential wasn't shy about running the most intimate details culled from these less-than-reputable sources. "I'm a Hollywood call girl," ran the lead to one article published in March of 1957. "For a price, I've been up against the best of the movieland wolves. But for sheer novelty, give me Danny Kaye every time."

The public lapped it up. At the height of its power, Confidential racked up a whopping four million monthly readers, with more copies sold of each issue than the circulation of such emblems of '50s Americana as Look or The Saturday Evening Post. "Everyone [in Hollywood] reads Confidential," Humphrey Bogart once said. "But they deny it. They say the cook brought it into the house."

But not everyone, as it turned out, read it with pleasure. In 1955, under pressure from the film industry, the U.S. government took steps to suppress Confidential. The Postal Service ruled that sexy stories about Sammy Davis Jr., Guy Madison and Walter Pidgeon, among others, were demonstrably obscene, and ordered Confidential's publishers to submit advance copies to the Solicitor General's office, which would rule (presumably very harshly) on their suitability to be distributed through the mail. It was a naked violation of the First Amendment, and with the help of ace attorney Edward Bennett Williams, Confidential beat back the challenge.

After that came the deluge. In 1957, a California state senator launched an investigation into whether Confidential was encouraging California-based private detectives into selling out their clients. When that tactic failed, California governor Goodwin Knight directed state attorney general Edmund G. Brown to mount a full-scale investigation of Confidential and its scores of imitators.

In a star-packed trial that included testimony from the likes of Dorothy Dandridge, Maureen O'Hara and Liberace, Confidential fought the state of California to a draw. After 15 days of deliberations, the jury hung, and a mistrial was declared. With legal costs mounting, Harrison accepted a plea bargain that included a guilty plea to one obscenity charge and a binding agreement to lay off Hollywood. It took Harrison just three issues to realize that a defanged Confidential was finished; he sold out, and though the magazine continued to publish well into the 1960s, its era of notoriety and influence was over.

Though its hyped-up tabloid style makes it a period piece today, the ghost of Confidential looms large over American celebrity journalism. Stories that would have rocked the public back in the Eisenhower era are now considered so commonplace that they are fit cover subjects for the likes of People and TV Guide. The more errant stars have themselves gotten into the act, often collaborating on their own carefully orchestrated "triumph of a survivor" publicity campaigns in which the most intimate and sordid details are passed out like free beer, accompanied by a "but that's all behind me now" chaser.

Meanwhile, the hold stardom has on the American consciousness has in many ways become its defining characteristic. Broadcast at us 24 hours a day, screaming at us from every supermarket checkout line, as close as the nearest moviehouse and as far away as the latest satellite transmission, celebrity has become pervasive, omnipresent. Proud of its outsider status, it's doubtful Confidential could survive in such a star-obsessed world. In America as well as all over the world, there simply no longer seems to be an outside.—Ray Greene

REVIEW DIGEST

Our monthly release overview 45

u may have read in various publications about patrons that are suing theatres for hearing damage while attend- a movie with digital sound. One suit is from a patron that claims permanent "ringing" in his ears after attend- an action movie, another claimed headaches for many days after leaving the theatre.

only product on the market that can control the level of digital players is the SMART Afterburner. This 6- nnel threshold limiter "burns off" the top dynamic range of the soundtrack without affecting the other sterling ulities of digital soundtracks. It works with almost every brand stereo processor and costs about 500 bucks*. AFT660 can help save your sound components from an early death and save the patron's ears. Ideal for multi- x installations with thin walls. Our friends call this the "no pain" product!

* Suggested retail price of the AFT660 is $495.00. Please contact your SMART dealer for the best price. The new AFT660PNP has a theatre net price of $675.00

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Ron Bass, who scripted the TriStar hit "My Best Friend's Wedding," has signed a three-year exclusive writing deal with Sony Pictures Entertainment. Before this pact (which also will have Bass producing other writers' scripts) commences in January, Bass will fulfill three other scripting commitments: "Mozart and the Whale," about a high-functioning autistic couple, for DreamWorks; an adaptation of "The Diving Bell and the Butterfly," also for DreamWorks; and an as-yet-unnamed project for Jerry Zucker and Universal.

Producer Sean Cunningham ("Friday the 13th") has formed Sun Valley Film Corp., a production company to handle mainstream fare, while his Cunningham Prods. will continue to focus on the horror genre. Currently in development at Cunningham Prods. is "Freddy vs. Jason" for New Line. Sun Valley's first project will be the romantic comedy "Gold Rush," about the relationship between a businesswoman and the owner of the small brewery she's trying to buy out. Their romance is put to the test when she learns her young-looking beau is really 177 years old. Also in the works at Sun Valley is "Necessary Evil," a comedy about an ex-con trying to get his son back from inept kidnappers without letting his wife know their child is missing.

Sandy Gallin's Sandollar Prods. has renewed its first-look pact with Disney for its theatrical product. Currently in development under the deal is a third "Father of the Bride" movie; a romantic comedy called "At Last" by "Swingers" scripter Jon Favreau; and "Bruno the Big Baby," a comedy by Robin Schiff ("Romy & Michele's High School Reunion").

Inspired by the popularity and success of touring musical festivals, filmmaker Suzanne Myers has organized Fuel, which she hopes will become the Lolapalooza of the exhibition industry. Fuel, a program of four films which will tour 11 cities, will feature Myers' own "Alchemy," about a young sculptor; Chris Smith's "American Job," which chronicles one man's succession of dead-end jobs; Dante Harper's "The Delicate Art of the Rifle," a black comedy about the 1966 mass murder at the University of Texas; and Hannah Weyer's "Arresting Gena," about a teenage girl who lives with her uncle when her mother falls into a coma. Fuel kicks off in October in Raleigh, N.C., and will then proceed to Washington, D.C.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Providence, R.I.; Cambridge, Mass.; Columbus, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, Calif.; Seattle, Wa.; and Portland, Ore. Booking was handled by Jeff Lipsky, co-founder of October Films and most recently head of distribution for East-West Film Partners. The venues Lipsky selected are all independent theatres with a commitment to art-house product. "I wanted to stick with the exhibitors who were steadfastly dedicated to independent film, to cutting-edge cinema, who played as much Strand Releasing product as they did Miramax product," Lipsky told BOXOFFICE. The cities were also strategically chosen to target the right audience. "It's kind of a mix between A and B markets, markets that have some kind of a college presence, markets that are known as cutting-edge markets, where such films tend to take root." The program will play for a week in each site, with the filmmakers travelling along to speak to audiences about their films. A second group of cities may be chosen to continue the tour in January, depending on the success of Fuel's maiden voyage. From there, Fuel may become an annual event: "I know Suzanne has every intention of creating a tradition here and maintaining that tradition."

Actor Ben Stiller ("Flirting With Disaster") has named George Linardos to run his Fox 2000-based production company, Red Hour Prods. Linardos was previously Uma Thurman's producing partner, and prior to that, he worked as a development executive for Oliver Stone's Ixtlan on such projects as "The People Vs. Larry Flynt."

Hallmark Entertainment Prods. Worldwide has appointed David Picker as its president as part of a major expansion into theatrical motion pictures. The company is currently selecting movie projects to produce and co-finance. Picker has headed production at United Artists, Paramount and Columbia in the past; most recently, he produced "The Crucible" for 20th Century Fox.

David Friendly is leaving his position as president of Davis Entertainment to form his own production company, Friendly Prods., and has already signed on with Fox 2000 for a three-year exclusive deal. Friendly's producing credits include "Out to Sea," "Courage Under Fire" and the upcoming "Dr. Dolittle."

Miramax Films has inked a first-look deal with "Shall We Dance?" director Masayuki Suo, producer Shoji Masui and Altamira Pictures. "Shall We Dance?," about a Japanese businessman who secretly takes ballroom dancing lessons, outperformed the debuts of Miramax's other successful foreign language films "Like Water For Chocolate," "Cinema Paradiso" and "Il Postino," taking in over $88,000 on its opening weekend and averaging more than $17,000 per screen. At press time, the film had grossed $3 million.

Dimension Films, Miramax's genre label, has entered into a two-picture deal with Craig Mazin and Greg Erb, a comedy-writing team who cut their teeth running Princeton's humor magazine. The duo has already sold two pitches: "Rocket Man," which Buena Vista will release this fall; and "Senseless," the Damon Wayans starrer, due out through Miramax in early 1998. Dimension has bought Mazin and Erb's pitch "Daddy's Boy," about a twentysomething guy who returns to his hometown to find that his mother is planning on marrying his former high school pal.

ANGELA BASSETT

Gets In The "Groove"

"THE HILO COUNTRY" Woody Harrelson ("The People Vs. Larry Flynt") and Billy Crudup ("Sleepers") will star in this film based on a book by Max Evans about two men who return from World War II and fall in love with the same woman. The project is one that the late filmmaker Sam Peckinpah had long wanted to bring to the screen. Walon Green, who scripted Peckinpah's "The Wild Bunch," wrote the "HiLo" adaptation. Stephen Frears ("The Van") will direct. (Distribution is to be set)

"DIRTY WORK" The perennially sardonic Norm Macdonald (TV's "Saturday Night Live") will star in this comedy, which he co-wrote with Frank Sebastiano. Macdonald will play a loser who finally finds his niche when he opens a business devoted to exacting revenge for clients. (MGM)

UNTITLED WOODY ALLEN The latest comedy from Woody Allen (whose "Deconstructing Harry" is due out through Fine Line in December) will star Kenneth Branagh ("The Gingerbread Man"), Winona Ryder ("Alien Resurrection"), Leonardo Di Caprio ("Romeo & Juliet"), Kim Basinger ("L.A. Confidential"), Saffron Burrows ("Circle of Friends"), Judy Davis ("Children of the Revolution"), Famke Janssen ("GoldenEye") and Jeffrey Wright ("Basquiat"). (Distribution is to be set)

"FREQUENCY" Tommy Lee Jones ("Men in Black") may star for director Renny Harlin in this film about a fireman in 1969 who somehow accidentally taps into the future through a ham radio, crossing almost 30 years to make contact, by chance, with his son, a homicide cop, in the present day. Through their conversations, the son is able to prevent his father's death in a fire, and tries to track down his mother's serial killer. (New Line)

"BOFINGER'S BIG THING" Steve Martin ("Father of the Bride II") scripted this comedy and will star as a down-and-out producer who has written a script and is desperate to make the film with a particular star, to be played by Eddie Murphy ("The Nutty Professor"). Frank Oz ("In and Out") will direct. (Distribution is to be set)

"MARTHA AND ARTHUR" "My Best Friend's Wedding" stars Julia Roberts and Rupert Everett will reteam in this comedy about a macho movie star (Everett) who is married to Roberts' character in an attempt to hide his homosexuality from his fans. Roberts and Everett first worked together in Robert Altman's "Ready to Wear." (Buena Vista)

"JOHN CARPENTER'S VAMPIRES" James Woods ("Contact") will play an expert vampire hunter from the Vatican. Sheryl Lee ("Bliss") and Daniel Baldwin ("Phoenix") also star. (Distribution is to be set)

"BACHELOR" Based on the 1925 Buster Keaton starrer "Seven Chances," this romantic comedy will star Chris O'Donnell ("Batman & Robin") as a bachelor who has 24 hours to get married in order to receive a multi-million dollar inheritance from his grandfather. (New Line)

"MARY STUART" Glenn Close ("Air Force One") and Meryl Streep ("Marvin's Room"), who worked together in 1994's "The House of the Spirits," will reunite in this film adaptation of Friedrich Schiller's play which chronicles the rivalry between royal cousins Mary Queen of Scots (Streep) and Queen Elizabeth I (Close) that resulted in Mary's execution. Richard Eyre, the director of the National Theatre in London, will helm. Streep and Close are co-producing. (Distribution is to be set)

"ELIZABETH I" Even in modern-day Hollywood, Mary Queen of Scots and Elizabeth I are rivals: In this take on the story, Cate Blanchett ("Paradise Road") will play Queen Elizabeth I opposite Geoffrey Rush ("Shine") as Sir Francis Walsingham in this historical drama which follows the coups, assassination attempts and foreign opposition Elizabeth faced during her reign from 1558 to 1603. "Bandit Queen's" Shekhar Kapur will direct. (Distribution is to be set)

"X-FILES: BLACKWOOD" David Duchovny and Gillian Anderson of TV's sci-fi phenomenon "The X-Files" will headline this bigscreen version, whose plot, appropriately enough, is shrouded in mystery, though parapsychology and conspiracies will no doubt figure largely. Martin Landau ("City Hall") will also star. "X-Files" creator Chris Carter produces and wrote the script; Rob Bowman, a producer and director of the TV series, directs. (Fox)

"LETHAL WEAPON 4" It looks likely that Mel Gibson will return for the fourth installment of the "Lethal Weapon" action-comedies. Reports indicate that he'll receive a $20 million upfront fee, while his backend participation deal could earn him an additional $15 million to $20 million. Danny Glover will also reprise his role as Gibson's partner. Filmmakers Richard Donner and Joel Silver of the "Lethal Weapon" series (as well as the recent Gibson starrer "Conspiracy Theory") also return, and "Conspiracy Theory" scripter Brian Helgeland is writing the screenplay. (Warner)

"ARMAGEDDON" Michael Bay ("The Rock") will helm this action-disaster film in which Bruce Willis ("The Fifth Element") heads up a team sent into space to destroy a meteor on a collision course with Earth. Billy Bob Thornton ("U-Turn"), Steve Buscemi ("Con Air") and Ben Affleck ("Chasing Amy") also star. Jonathan Hensleigh ("The Saint") wrote the script, and Jerry Bruckheimer and Gale Anne Hurd produce. (Buena Vista)

"HOW STELLA GOT HER GROOVE BACK" This adaptation of Terry McMillan's bestseller will topline Angela Bassett (who also starred in the screen version of McMillan's "Waiting to Exhale) as a divorced working mother who takes a trip to Jamaica where she has an affair with a younger man. Whoopi Goldberg ("The Associate") will play Stella's best friend. "Exhale" scripter Ron Bass also returns. (Fox)

"ALMOST ROMANTIC" Janeane Garofalo ("Matchmaker") and Jon Stewart (TV's "The Jon Stewart Show") are in talks to star as the contentious maid of honor and best man at their friends' wedding. When the groom is incapacitated, they're offered the non-refundable Carribbean honeymoon, which they accept, despite their mutual disdain. (Buena Vista)

ET CETERA: Ron Howard is in talks to direct Jim Carrey in New Line's remake of "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty"...Jeff Goldblum and Kelly Preston have joined Eddie Murphy in the comedy "Holy Man"...Following Brad Pitt and Gwyneth Paltrow's breakup, Paltrow's father Bruce, who was to have made his directorial debut on Columbia's "Duets," pulled the plug on the project, which would have starred the duo.

NCS Corp Introduces "The Producer"

Now every theatre can afford to play optical stereo or SR soundtracks for the exceptionally low price of $10,599.95 or $250.16 per month.*

The "Producer" is a complete 6 channel cinema stereo system. A factory wired wall rack includes the new 6-channel MOD VI stereo processor, the MN600 "Soundcheck" booth monitor, the new TA6300 6-channel power amplifier, 3 Stage 1-90 screen loudspeaker systems, 8 SMART Wharfedale 2180 surround speakers for split surround, and the powerful DS573 18" subwoofer. This new system is designed for auditoriums with 250 seats or less. All components in the system are matched for perfect sound reproduction and maximum efficiency.

Adding a digital player is very easy! Ask for the new Digital Now package that includes the AFTERBURNER threshold limiter and and the digital Plug 'N Play panel that allows you to move your "roll around" digital players from system to system. This option is only 1 cent more in price.

FREE! Each theatre purchasing "Producer" stereo systems will receive a SMART digital "On-hold" telephone message player. Your own professionally recorded commercial message featuring your theatre's name with royalty-free background music is included. A $690 value.

TRIAL RUN

Maverick Filmmaker FRANCIS COPPOLA Takes His Case to the Court of Public Opinion With "THE RAINMAKER"

by Susan Lambert

Thirty years ago, Francis Coppola (who in 1977 dropped his middle moniker, Ford, stating he didn't trust anyone with three names) was on the brink of what was to become the most hailed—and often simultaneously railed-upon—career of any American filmmaker since Orson Welles. His "You're a Big Boy Now" opened in March of 1967 to good reviews and was considered a breakthrough artistic piece for the young director/screenwriter. Later that same year, Coppola began shooting "The Rain People," an experience which generated so much camaraderie between the director and his crew that it inspired in him the idea to create a revolutionary film studio—American Zoetrope. Three decades, five Oscars, one failed film studio and many controversys later, the man who was once lovingly referred to by his actors as Ayatollah Coppola took a moment during his post-production schedule on "The Rainmaker," an adaptation of yet another John Grisham courtroom bestseller to talk about his latest project and his visions for the future. The result is something unique: a portrait of the artist as a middle-aged journeyman, plying his trade in corporate America.

While the Coppola who filmed "The Rain People" was an ambitious young idealist-without-a-cause, the Coppola of "The Rainmaker" is a cautious, realistic artisan who recognizes the value of commissioned work. It's interesting to note that when Coppola's representatives at American Zoetrope, his production company, agreed on his behalf to this interview, there was one condition: no questions about "The Godfather." Just about everything there is to say about "The Godfather" has been said and re-said, but with any powerful figure, stipulations like that can be the first step in creating an interview that is too cautious at best, promotional nonsense at worst.

But the interesting and compelling thing about Coppola, in conversation as in even the most problematic of his films, is that the artist in him usually gets the best of him. His flaws as well as his virtues have a compelling purity to them that shines on through his work.

You can't really exist without [a studio's] favor. They own it. And there is not a filmmaker or an artist on the board of any one of those companies.

And he has so much to say. Coppola spent years being led around by his vision; it was vision that pushed him to the pinnacle and pushed him off of it. He survived, and found a way to come back from difficulties that might have destroyed a less determined filmmaker. That one of the true modern American artists and visionaries has in the process been forced to become a high-priced gun for hire may say more about our time and the nature of the movie industry than it says about the man.

A maverick who allows himself to be temporarily tamed in order to get what he needs from the establishment faces the possibility of losing what set him apart to begin with. But Coppola not only made some of the great American movies, he still believes in the idea of them, and that's what keeps him going, and makes him still so fascinating.

Coppola admits he picked up a copy of Grisham's "The Rainmaker" out of curiosity. "I thought I would read it and see what I could learn about what makes something such a bestseller." On a plane to France, Coppola found himself jotting notes in the margins of the book about what he liked. He was drawn to the characters and the story of Rudy, a young law student involved in the low-down, sleazy world of ambulance chasers who eventually takes on an important case fighting a big, bad insurance company that refuses to pay for a bone marrow transplant that would save a young man's life.

Coppola knocked off a letter to Grisham asking if the rights were available. "In my letter I said, 'Please don't sell it to the studios, because they're stupid, stupid, stupid.' You have to know the book to appreciate that [reference], otherwise it's just an insult to the studios." Coppola pauses before adding (ironically?), "Which, of course, I would never do."

Grisham wrote back that the rights had already been acquired by Michael Douglas and Steven Reuther, who eventually came around to ask Coppola if he would be interested in directing the film. Obviously, he was.

"If you're not in the position to just go out and do the movie you might want to do," says Coppola, "it's certainly much better to do something like a John Grisham 'Rainmaker' than to do something about a plane getting hijacked or whatever—a story that they [the studios] seem to do over and over again."

In an industry that survives on image, control and calculation, Coppola is candid about his fall from grace, and surprisingly honest about his hired gun status. "These are not projects that I'm creating from scratch as I've sometimes had the privilege of doing in the past. The market isn't really so much interested in films from filmmakers doing their personal work, so basically, the jobs are to do projects that exist."

It's almost as if he's apologizing for taking on an obvious sell like the Grisham book, but Coppola's history is one of taking popular novels (Mario Puzo's "The Godfather," S.E. Hinton's "The Outsiders" and "Rumble Fish" and even "Bram Stoker's Dracula") and turning them into, at the very least, popular cinema and at the very best, great cinema. "Obviously," says Coppola, "Great literature is great for a reason, and it's theoretical that if you can capture that, you can have great cinema. But a lot of wonderful movies have [also] been made out of so-called 'popular novels.' John Grisham definitely has a talent for coming up with a story and interesting characters."

It was those characters that really interested Coppola in "The Rainmaker." Because he saw them as "a wonderful bunch of parts for actors," preserving them intact became the greatest challenge when he began adapting the novel to the screen. "I felt the insurance in this case was a wonderful climax to the story, but I would have been very disappointed if we lost some of the peripheral characters."

Coppola says that even when he tries to remain as faithful to the book as possible, the nature of a film often makes it difficult to interweave the many subplots a novel contains. "If you introduce multiple stories in a movie, you are always in danger of interrupting what the audience is interested in, so you have to do it very deftly and you have to do it at the right moment." Coppola finds audience test screenings to be helpful in the editing process. "I found on 'Godfather II,' where we had a lot of multiple stories, it took me a while to really find the combination of how one story would begin and go to another story... It requires a little bit of editorial skill and patience to lead the audience so it isn't a competing story or an interrupting story, but a parallel story."

Coppola feels he found the right balance for "The Rainmaker," though he admits that an unconventional romantic subplot posed special problems. "The love interest is a tough one," he says, "because there are so many stories and then, all of a sudden, there's another one." In the book, Rudy falls for a very young and horribly abused married woman named Kelly. For Coppola, casting Claire Danes ("Romeo & Juliet") in the role became vital to making it work. "It's a pretty tough role, because she had to play a character basically in tears and beat up most of the time," explains Coppola. "I had hoped—and I hope—that just Claire's essence and her youth—she's only about 18 years old or so—brings the role to life."

Though he has high praise for Danes ("She's a prodigy," he says) Coppola seems surprisingly hesitant when pressed about what else he's doing to make the difficult relationship work. "I don't know, her skill, the relationship, a 'love theme' [for the characters]?"

He's equally reluctant to speak of "The Rainmaker" on a personal level. In the book, a family watches their son die needlessly. The situation can't help but bring to mind the untimely death of Coppola's own son, Gio, who was killed in an accident on Coppola's 1987 movie "Gardens of Stone". But Coppola doesn't see the connection. "My own personal story is not all that really relevant to this particular book," he says. "I mean, when anyone loses a child I can very be very moved. This last year there have been instances [among people I know], and I find it very moving. But no, I don't think that had a lot to do [with 'The Rainmaker.']"

FULL COURT PRESS: Coppola on the set of his new "David and Goliath" legal saga, John Grisham's "The Rainmaker."

Coppola says the film surprises people because it turned out to be very funny. "In fact, people at first are like, 'Well, is this a comedy or a drama?' And I say, 'It's like Chekhov, you know, it's both.'"

Thematically, Coppola sees "The Rainmaker" as more a David and Goliath story. "I think the theme of a young, idealistic lawyer coming in at the bottom and finding himself battling a giant corporation is appealing." But even Coppola's works-for-hire have such an infusion of Coppola's vision that it's hard to not find connections between the story and the filmmaker.

There is at least one potential view of "The Rainmaker" that fits in with the notion of Coppola as artist/auteur. Coppola himself was once a young, idealistic film student working in the bottom echelon of the film world—i.e. his early work on porn flicks and Roger Corman films—who ended up battling the studio giants.

In "The Rainmaker," Rudy wins his battle against big money, but the kid has already died from his illness, and the settlement never materializes, so the win is double-edged. "Most things that involve big money as a goal, in the end, the money all evaporates and you die of cancer or you lose your kid or something much more important basically makes the money goal all add up to nothing," says Coppola. "I think that's what the book is driving at. You try to win, but in the end, there are more important things than those money prizes."

An interesting philosophy taken in context with Coppola's own very public financial difficulties (all of which stemmed from his failed attempt to create a studio in the early 1980s). He once made a comment about being embarrassed by the duality of his success and failure. "In my own case," says Coppola, "I was so young and full of enthusiasm and I made movies more out of, really, a kind of innocence. I just did it. I made 'The Godfather' and 'The Conversation' and 'Godfather II' and 'Apocalypse Now,' and I was shocked at all the trouble I was in at the end of it. How disgraced I was. That's before I realized it was sort of all a game, and I took it very hard—my disgrace after "Apocalypse" and "One From the Heart" and losing my studio. I kind of even didn't know what I had done wrong. Now I look back and I say, 'Gee, that was quite a run I had going.'"

Indeed it was—an unparalleled run of achievement, followed by a dramatic downturn worthy of Shakespearean drama. In many ways, the sheer magnitude of his success made his failures seem perhaps even more significant than they were. "The only movies that got wild with me," he claims, "were the ones that I financed, so I basically was not hurting any investors."

Now on a comeback trail that really seemed to begin with the critical and commercial success of "Bram Stoker's Dracula," Coppola no longer spouts the rhetoric of a rebellious outsider, particularly when it comes to the bottom line. He would appear to understand all too well what the price of success and failure is in the film industry. He answers now to higher authority, the very thing he fought so desperately against for so many years. Coppola explains, "I've been very careful [of late] to make films that have been impeccably produced and done without controversy. These movies are under-budget and under-schedule. Obviously, I'm trying to earn that trust."

A PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST: Francis Coppola on the set of "The Rainmaker."

This from the man who once said, "The way to come to power is to make a place in the Establishment and then challenge and double-cross the Establishment." One of the most interesting aspects to Coppola's films and his career was that even when he tried to become the Establishment, the artist in him never gave in long enough to the businessman to make anyone believe the charade. Even now, as he's "playing ball," Coppola is contemplating another trip to the summit.

"I did want to do a couple more pictures where I got paid before I basically just write movies that may or may not ever get made," says Coppola. "I'm considered an attractive director for actors and what-have-you, [and] I thought it would be nice, really, to make a couple of [commercial] pictures before I go off on the long, cold, lonely journey. 'Jack' was the first, and 'Rainmaker' was the second. I thought there would be a third, but I really don't see one. So maybe there will only be those two. I have quite a good track record, so I'm hoping all that will eventually hold me in good stead when I'm ready to leap off a cliff."

Coppola refuses to talk about what those personal projects might be, or even when he would pursue that track. "Obviously it has to be at a time when I'm sure that I've really provided for my family. I'm 58 years old and in pretty good shape and have no limitations except that I'm less able to put up with doing stuff that I'm not in love with."

Coppola says he hopes critics will respond to his movies and understand what he's trying to do, but he doesn't put a lot of stock in critical acclaim or disclaim. "Historically, the movies that got really trashed went on to be put in among the great movies, so it's sort of hard to take it too much to heart. More important is the perception of whether people want to let me make another movie or not."

Coppola says that because of the state of the industry at the moment, that's a very real concern. And not just for him. "I don't know any major, established director who is not in the same situation, where they fear that basically the time is rapidly growing near where they'll never be able to make films again." He adds that it's impossible to get a film made that is not a studio-friendly (i.e., market-driven) picture. "It's very hard to say to them, 'I'd like to make another 'Apocalypse Now.'" Obviously, not in that setting, but of that scale or with that kind of original theme."

Coppola's ability to do that died with the bloody death of American Zoetrope's studio incarnation. But Zoetrope, like the filmmaker himself, has survived in a smaller, more realistic form. Coppola explains, "Zoetrope exists, but we don't risk our own money anymore, so that means we're less. The films we make are not those wonderful, daring and special films like 'Koyaanisqatsi' or 'Apocalypse' or the style of films that we love." But Zoetrope does produce eclectic movies, like the excellent Latino-themed "Mi Familia," as well as big-budget cable and network television, like the TV smash "The Odyssey" and an upcoming adaptation of "Moby Dick." Coppola is proud of Zoetrope, which now also produces a short story magazine, even if it's not the grandiose studio he wanted it to be. "It has a great track record, when you think about it."

Still, there is something almost wistful about Coppola's assessment of himself in the context of the filmmaker he most wishes he could be. "The filmmaker I admire most is Woody Allen," he says. "He just makes his own films. You don't hear about him directing a John Grisham book, or a Disney project. I have such admiration for the fact that he's created his career in that way. I would love, in the near future, to be considered a filmmaker that only does his own writing. I hope."

Even Coppola's most personal movies are almost always of a very different breed than Allen's, created on a scope and scale that requires significant financial backing. "It does take a partner to finance [my work]," he agrees, meaning a major studio. "It's not just their money [I need], because I've produced a lot of films without their money. It's ultimately their distribution. You can't really exist without their favor. They own it. They own the means of distribution. They own the finance. And there is not a filmmaker or an artist on the board of any one of those companies."

For a moment, the fiery, maverick, idealistic Coppola peeks through before the hard-won pragmatic side takes over again. Asked if he now accepts the idea that the studio system he tried to overthrow is the best way to run a film studio, the wiser, older, "cooperative" Coppola says, "I'm basically disinterested. I don't mind if," Coppola sighs before continuing the thought, "if the public supports their products. Me, I'm in the wine business." The reference is to Coppola's flourishing vineyards in Northern California, and it's not an entirely flippant one. In fact, Coppola says his wine company is doing better than his film company is.

So will the wine someday pay for the feature films? "I don't know if it would ever do that," Coppola says, "but it's not impossible. Certainly, the wine supports my family."

Coppola has been gracious with his time, stretching the scheduled 30 minutes to almost an hour. It's time to go, but Coppola hesitates before wrapping things up. He has one thing left to say, perhaps the most optimistic and benevolent comment in a surprisingly candid bunch: "I leave you with one thought. The United States has the most extraordinary wave of young talented people in their 20s and 30s that are coming who are passionate about film and are extremely pure about it. I would say in four or five years they're going to hit the so-called establishment with such a force. And I just... my gut tells me, they're just not going to be able to buy them off... This young generation that they refer to as Generation X? That's a misnomer. If anything, they're Generation P, they're the promising generation. They're going to change what movies are."

Taken from the man who thirty years ago predicted digital systems and electronics would revolutionize the industry and whose pioneering efforts led the way for Dreamworks SKG and Lucasfilm, these are words not only to heed, but perhaps commit to memory. They are the words of a man who has been to the brink and back, and who isn't afraid to get back out there along the edge.

"The Rainmaker." Starring Matt Damon and Claire Danes. Directed and written by Francis Coppola. Produced by Michael Douglas and Steven Reuther. A Paramount Pictures release. Nov. 13 (tentative).

MANN'S CHINESE THEATRE

ON ITS

THE BEST MANN

As Mann's Chinese Theatre Turns 70, BOXOFFICE Celebrates A Glorious Exhibition History by Jon Alon Walz

In 1973, Mann Theatres acquired the Chinese Theatre—one of the most famous moviehouses in the world. Instantly, the Chinese became Mann's flagship, and a living symbol of the circuit's commitment to the past and future of the movie medium. To understand the unique symbiosis between Mann and the Chinese, it is necessary to go back into the past some 70 years, when a pioneering exhibition visionary decided to create the ultimate viewing space...

CHINESE ARCHITECTURE: Sid Grauman built Hollywood's world-famous Chinese Theatre in 1927. Today, it's one of the most visited tourist spots in America.

Over the past 100 years, the art of the motion picture has evolved from the simplicity of random moving images projected in a dusty corner of Thomas Edison's basement into the amazing multinational, multibillion-dollar economic behemoth it is today. And no one cinema better exemplifies the grandeur and integral import of exhibition than Mann's Chinese Theatre, which turns 70 this year. The venue of choice for Hollywood premieres and one of the top-visited tourist attractions in the United States thanks to its unique forecourt of celebrity handprints and footprints, the Chinese was the brainchild of exhibitor Sid Grauman. The last theatre he would ever build, the Chinese capped off in a typically stellar style Grauman's lifelong dedication to the business of showmanship.

In the seemingly simpler time before 30-screen multiplexes, 3,000-print releases and digital surround sound became de facto industry standards, this cutting-edge West Coast exhibitor—working with nothing but a big dream and some grandiose notions—single-handedly created the craft of large-scale exhibition publicity and ultimately elevated it into an art.

Although he did not live to see the first multiplex, Sid Grauman will always be remembered as the visionary who recognized the public's need for movies and glamour. By building such renowned Los Angeles theatres as the Chinese and Egyptian and consistently promoting them in a grand style, Grauman was among a tiny group of insiders who collectively turned a sleepy little movie town in Southern California into "Hollywood."

"Showmanship is like any other merchandising," Grauman noted in 1931. "You must first buy desirable material, then present it to attractive advantage, and price it right. Above all, you must let the whole world know what you have to sell."

Grauman spent virtually his entire life selling and promoting events and entertainment. Born in 1879 to Rosa and David Grauman, he was soon whisked from his birthplace in Indianapolis to a small mining community in Colorado, where his father was a participant in the great gold rush of the late 1800s. Adopting his father's adventurous approach to life—it took a certain type of person to fully embrace the promise and risks of the gold rush—Grauman was quick to make friends wherever he went. According to Charles Beardsley, author of "Hollywood's Master Showman: The Legendary Sid Grauman," one of Grauman's earliest successes as an impresario was at a rather well-attended birthday party for a young girlfriend. As the evening progressed and the mood became somber, 10-year-old Sid canvassed the crowd looking for people with either musical or dramatic talent in order to put on a little show.

"It was not long before Sid put a young lady on the town hall platform to recite humorous poems while he found a rustic violinist and a harmonica player who were glad to improvise rudimentary dance music," writes Beardsley. "And eventually when the dancing palled, he led the partygoers in communal games. He realized that he had a very real ability to cater to people's tastes, to know instinctively what they wanted. This may well have been his first conscious awareness that he could please the public."

From Colorado, Grauman and his father followed the gold rush mania to the Yukon Territory in Alaska. Here, Grauman staged the occasional variety show for the entertainment-starved residents. An early success was a benefit for the local newsboys. Blizzards had prevented regional papers from reaching the town, and the newsboys were quickly going broke. Sid scoured the town for talent of any sort to perform in his show. Response was overwhelming: The event raised an impressive $1,200.

Soon after, his father left Alaska for San Francisco to take care of one of Grauman's sisters who had fallen ill. Grauman stayed in Alaska for another year before rejoining his family in California, where he started his life in the movies.

Grauman saw his first movie at San Francisco's Cinemagraph theatre. Impressed by and curious about this odd spectacle, he landed a job at the theatre as a jack-of-all-trades, and quickly recognized that the ever-expanding revenue streams produced by these flickering "novelties" made them as legitimate a business as any other.

His father, redirecting his gold rush fever, agreed to help young Sid start his own movie theatre, the Unique on Market Street. It was an instant success. Adopting a part-live show, part-movies program, Grauman was the first to hire such performers as Jessy Lasky, who would later help found Paramount Pictures, and Al Jolson, who later became a major movie star. "Sid had, even in those days, the uncanny ability to pick exceptional talent," notes Beardsley.

Several years later, the Graumans built a new theatre, the Lyceum, that, along with the Unique, was completely destroyed in the 1906 San Francisco earthquake and fires. Quickly devising a stunt to return movies to the city, Grauman struck a deal with an evangelist who sold him a big-top canvas tent and enough pews for 3,000 people. Mere days after the disaster, movies returned to San Francisco under Grauman's mammoth promotional banner, which assured patrons there was "nothing to fall on you except canvas."

The canvas theatre was, again, another instant hit, drawing 10,000 people a day. It operated continuously for two years and solidified Grauman's standing as San Francisco's master showman.

Grauman began expanding his theatrical franchise further into the Bay area and even operated two theatres on two different occasions in New York City. Around 1917, he and his father made their most important decision yet—a decision perfectly consistent with the impulsive nature of their lives thus far:

Sell it all. Move to Los Angeles.

The Graumans' first Los Angeles theatre was not designed to be just another venue for the movies. It was designed to dominate and eclipse the marketplace. Opening February 1, 1918 in the downtown area, the 2,345-seat Million Dollar Theatre was the West's largest and most lavishly appointed motion picture venue. Opening night drew such luminaries as

ONE SMALL STEP FOR MANN, ONE GIANT STEP FOR MANKIND

Mann Theatres Helps Revitalize Hollywood; Brings Chinese Theatre to New Cities

Mann Theatres, owners of Sid Grauman's world-famous Chinese Theatre since 1973, is adding 14 screens to the Hollywood landmark as part of a major revitalization of Hollywood Boulevard: The 15-screen Chinese will anchor a $145 million, 500,000-square-foot entertainment complex being developed by destination center designers TrizecHahn. The chain is also in the process of choosing locales for replica Chinese Theatres in select sites across America. Mann president and CEO Chuck Goldwater spoke with BOXOFFICE about Mann's plans to expand the Chinese dynasty.

A sketch of the entertainment center in which the Chinese Theatres' 14 new screens will be housed.

BOXOFFICE: Mann's Chinese Theatre is the last of the grand Hollywood movie palaces that's still very much a going concern. What is the secret?

CHUCK GOLDWATER: The secret is the magic of the theatre that has endured for 70 years now. It's the timelessness that the years have created for it. Certainly the unique nature of the forecourt of stars has created that sense of timelessness. It's given it a unique and personal attachment to the stars whose footprints are immortalized there.

BOXOFFICE: What are the details of Mann's expansion plans for the Chinese?

GOLDWATER: As part of the new entertainment project being developed [by TrizecHahn], we are going to do some considerable renovation to the existing Chinese theatre. Some clean-up, fix-up, patch-up, re-touch. We're contemplating re-seating the big Chinese Theatre auditorium. We're going to have 14 new screens in what [will be] several hundred thousand square feet of a new entertainment retail/restaurant/entertainment project [that is] the vision and the implementation of David Malmuth, who previously was with Disney in putting together their 42nd Street project in New York City.

BOXOFFICE: What do you think this is going to do for Hollywood?

GOLDWATER: It's certainly going to continue and hopefully accelerate the revitalization that is already underway in Hollywood.

BOXOFFICE: How do you feel to be the custodian of such an important piece of movie history as the Chinese Theatre?

GOLDWATER: Well, for me personally as a former film student who started as an usher in this business, I feel an extraordinary privilege and pride in being part of this grand tradition. [At Mann], we all take greatly to heart that the Chinese Theatre is ours to preserve and enhance, going forward into the future. We see it as such a special element of our company that we're working to create a prototype theatre based on the Chinese Theatre experience—the world's most famous movie theatre and everything that connotes, the grandeur of Hollywood that it represents—and create a unique and differentiating moviegoing experience in the new theatres that we'll be building in major destination locations.

BOXOFFICE: You're going to recreate the Chinese in different sites?

GOLDWATER: That's what we're trying to do. We're trying to replicate the experience without in any way diminishing or diluting the original. We have one under construction right now in Southeast Denver. It will be 16 screens, 4,000 seats, all-stadium, all-digital stereo, the finest in film and sound presentation and customer service excellence. And there are others that we're contemplating—very selectively. It is not the kind of attraction that we would do on every street corner. It would be reserved for special, major potential destination sites.

BOXOFFICE: Will you replicate the forecourt?

GOLDWATER: Rather than doing a forecourt of movie stars, our approach is to do a forecourt of fame of the local community stars: the police officer or firefighter hero of the year, the community volunteer leader, the student scholar athlete of the year, [so that] as well as being a place of entertainment that people come and partake of, [it] also becomes a local community landmark that everyone in the area participates in.

BOXOFFICE: What excites you about the exhibition industry?

GOLDWATER: What excites me is customers are responding to the great new movie theatres that are being built. They're responding to the improvements—the size, the scale, the convenience, the modern technology, the comfort—that all these new theatres are providing to them. And it encourages all of us to build these new theatres, to make sure we run them right with our customers foremost in mind. It tells me that showmanship is alive and well. Customer service is the road to the future. And Sid Grauman was right. Give the customers something to keep them coming back, and they will keep coming back. —Christine James

Cecil B. De Mille, Charlie Chaplin, Douglas Fairbanks and D.W. Griffith. Tens of thousands turned out in an attempt to get into the theatre, which was declared a success by residents and the local papers before the first patron was even seated.

The opening feature was the William S. Hart vehicle "The Silent Man," which was preceded by a rough version of the Sid Grauman Prologue, a live presentation of dance, recitation and song that was designed to complement the night's feature. Grauman experimented with prologues in San Francisco in the years after visiting New York City and seeing similar presentations by rival Samuel "Roxy" Rothafel.

"[Grauman's prologues] were essentially half the evening's entertainment—the film was the second half," actor Douglas Fairbanks Jr., whose father was good friends with Grauman, told BOXOFFICE. "The prologue took almost as much time as the film! He used them to set the atmosphere for the feature, and they were too lavish to be believed."

Grauman's prologues in Los Angeles became as popular as many of the pictures he showed in his theatres. "Whereas Roxy believed in presenting a diversified program of high-toned musical acts that bore no relation to the theme of the feature, Sid built his prologues around the picture, so that a Grauman show, movie and all, was a complete unit in mood, music and pageantry," writes Ben Hall in "The Best Remaining Seats." These pre-feature promotional devices immediately endeared Grauman to the entire city. Grauman had finally struck gold. For the rest of his life he had to turn enthusiastic, paying customers away from his theatres. He was a star in the only town where stars are real.

Following the opening of the Million Dollar, Grauman purchased and refurbished the nearby Rialto, a 900-seat theatre constructed in 1910 by entrepreneur J.M. Quinn. The name "Grauman" above the door of the Rialto equaled instant success.

Grauman quickly became close friends with the heads of all the studios, as well as all the major stars and directors of the day, all of whom wanted and needed him to show their movie in the hottest showcase in America. Grauman valued and cherished his friends, and would always go out of his way to help them—though they weren't spared from occasionally becoming the targets of his devilish sense of humor. "He liked to play practical jokes on people," recalls Douglas Fairbanks Jr. "There was a trick he and my father played on Chaplin during a preview of one of his films. They persuaded him to stand in the back of the theatre so no one would see him and so he could judge the audience's reaction without them responding to his presence. But there was no audience reaction at all! They didn't laugh at any of the jokes—it was dead as a funeral. This went on for a long time until Grauman and my father revealed that the entire audience consisted of wax dummies."

By the early '20s, in an effort to retain maximum profits from their features, the studios began buying and building their own theatre chains to exclusively display their product, while simultaneously coercing the "independents" to sign exclusivity contracts with one of them—otherwise, essential studio product would be denied. It would take until the 1950s for antitrust regulations to curb such strong-arm practices.

At this point Grauman was operating as an independent exhibitor, and fought to remain as such throughout his career. His power as a showman kept his theatres popular and full, allowing him to book at will the finest features in the marketplace. "One of the reasons for Grauman's enduring success was the friendly cooperation that stars and executives were willing to give him because of his constant readiness to offer them a favor without a thought of its return," notes Beardsley.

In October of 1922, Grauman expanded out of the Los Angeles downtown area and into the rapidly expanding suburb of Hollywood, about 15 minutes west. The 1,800-seat Egyptian, designed to mimic the lavish palaces at the time of Cleopatra, was the first major movie palace to open outside of downtown.

Three months later, Grauman opened his last downtown theatre, the Metropolitan. At 3,485 seats it was the largest movie theatre ever built in the West, and at $3 million the costliest. On opening night, 30,000 people were turned away.

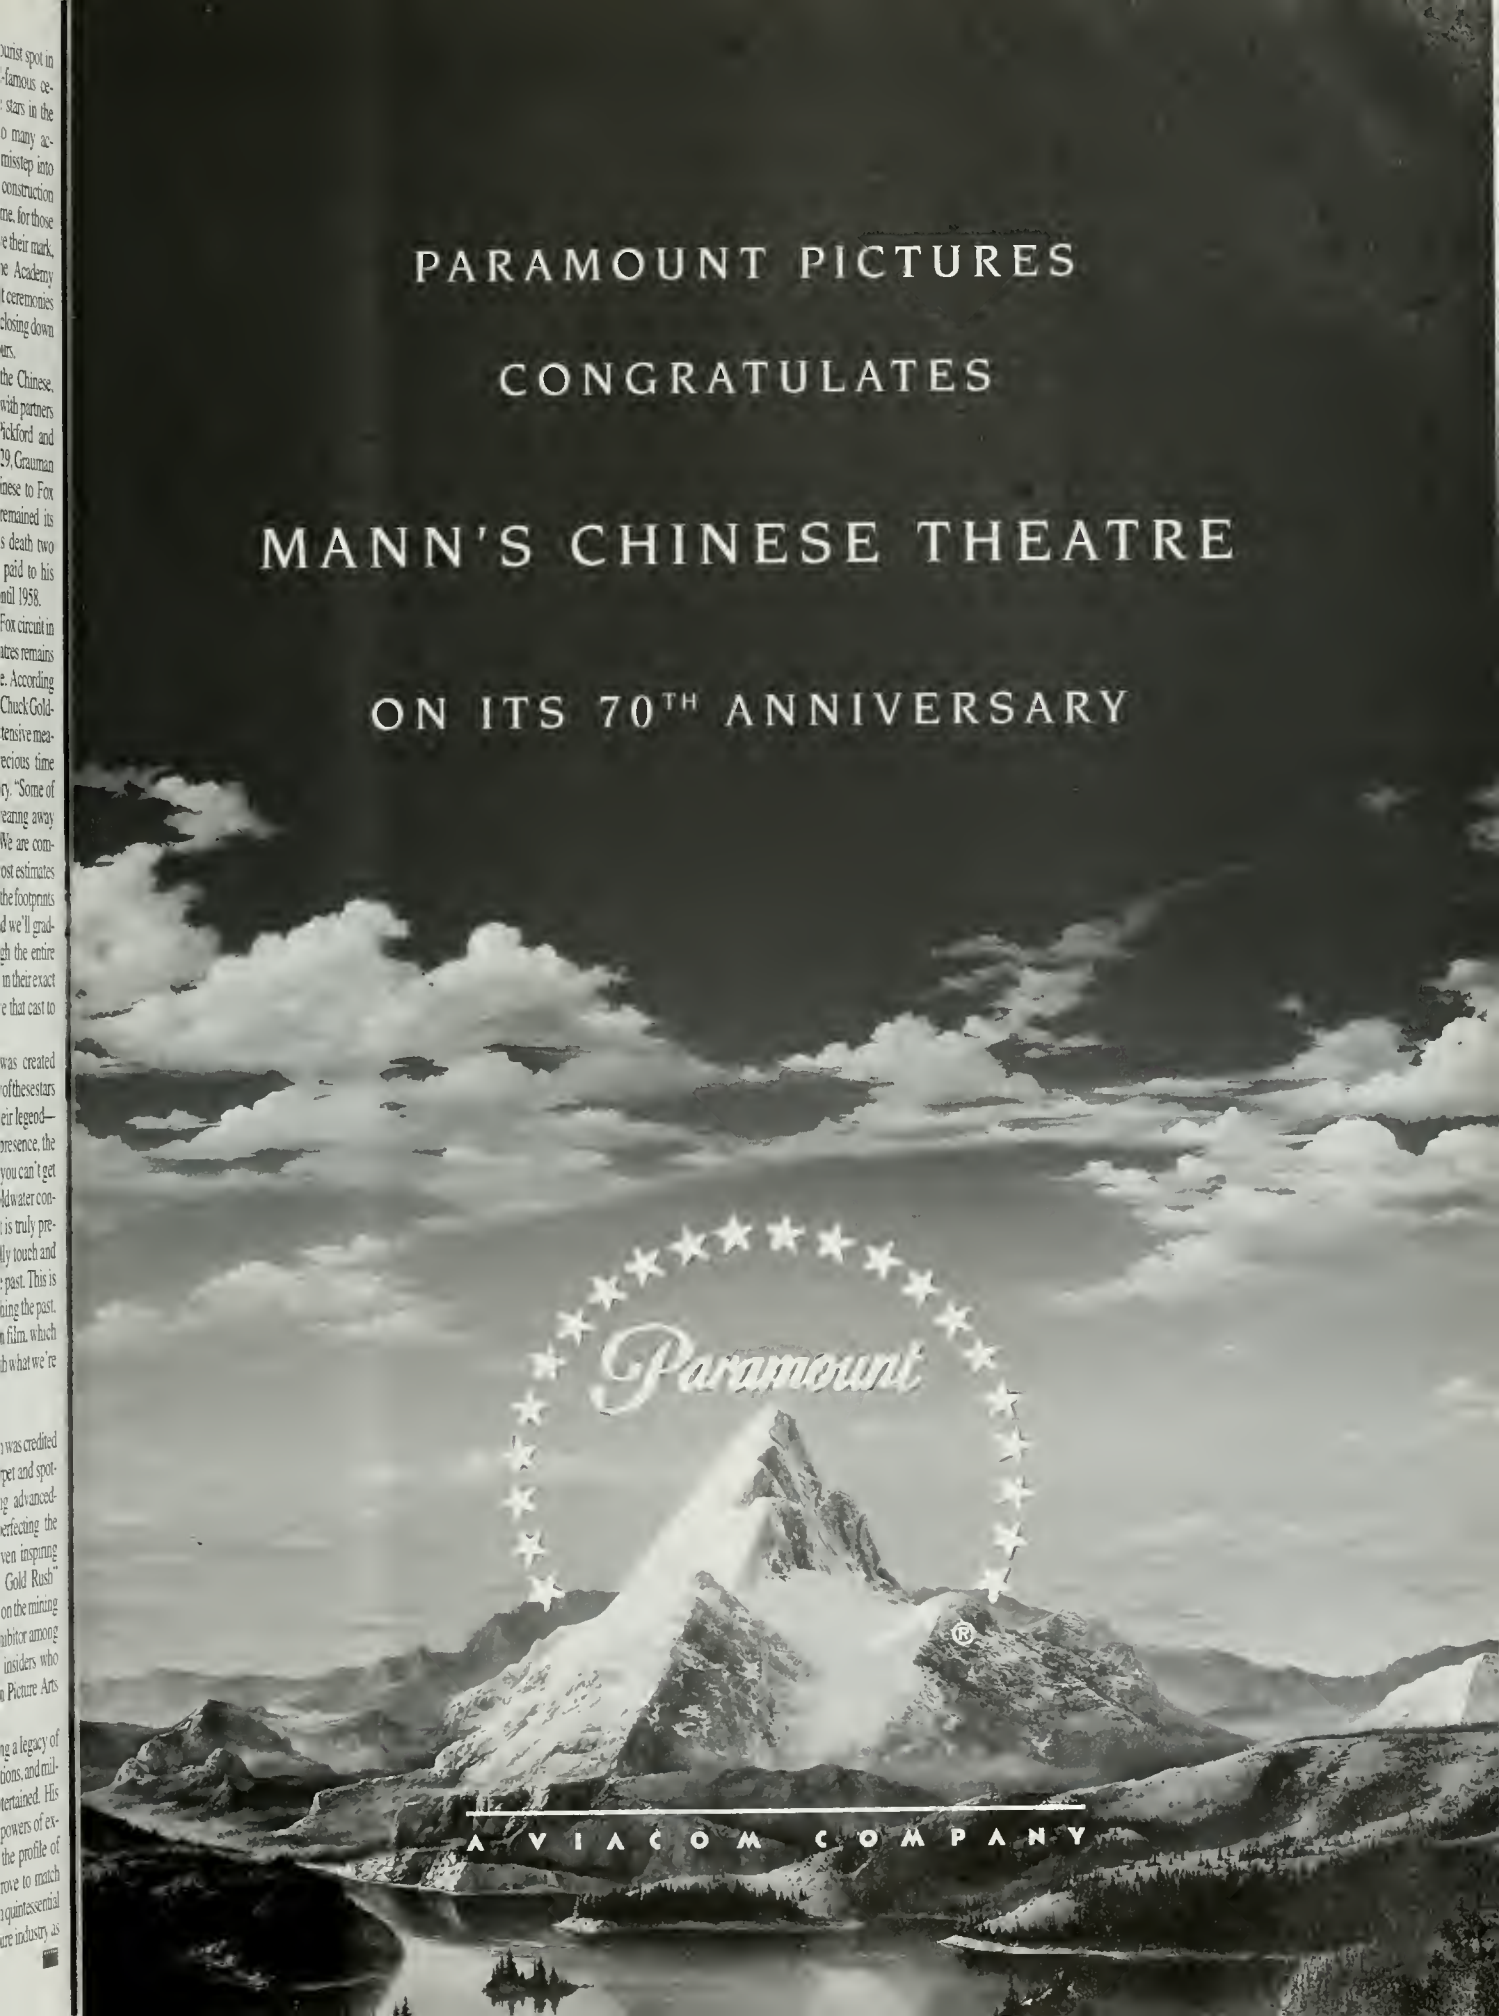
Grauman's final theatre, the Chinese, was built in the heart of Hollywood in 1927; actress Norma Talmadge inaugurated its star-studded legacy by personally turning the first spadeful of dirt at its groundbreaking. Over the past 70 years, the Chinese has become one of the definitive symbols of Hollywood, and, after Disneyland, is the most visited tourist spot in Southern California. The world-famous cement hand and footprints of the stars in the theatre's courtyard, according to many accounts, began as an accidental misstep into some concrete on the Chinese's construction site that has serendipitously become, for those lucky enough to be invited to leave their mark, an accolade akin to winning the Academy Award. Recent hand and footprint ceremonies still draw thousands to the theatre, closing down Hollywood Boulevard for hours.

Grauman never owned the Chinese, but held a one-third interest with partners Howard Schenck, Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks Sr. In 1929, Grauman sold his interest in the Chinese to Fox West Coast Theatres; he remained its managing director until his death two decades later. A fee was paid to his estate for use of his name until 1958.

Ted Mann purchased the Fox circuit in 1973, and today, Mann Theatres remains the custodian of the Chinese. According to Mann president and CEO Chuck Goldwater, the circuit is taking extensive measures to preserve this precious time capsule of Hollywood history. "Some of the footprints have been wearing away through time," he notes. "We are completing some analysis and cost estimates for making casts of some of the footprints that have worn the most, and we'll gradually work our way through the entire forecourt. We'll recast them in their exact original form, and then have that cast to preserve them for all time.

"It's something that was created once and only once—many of these stars have passed away. And their legend—what is literal about their presence, the footprints and the handprints—you can't get them back to do that again," Goldwater continues. "There's something that is truly precious about being able to literally touch and feel a sense of connection to the past. This is the closest we can come to touching the past, other than seeing it preserved on film, which certainly goes hand-in-hand with what we're doing at the Chinese."

During his career, Grauman was credited with devising the red carpet and spotlight premiere, inventing advanced-ticket sales for the movies, perfecting the pre-feature presentation, and even inspiring Charlie Chaplin's movie "The Gold Rush" with outlandish stories of his life on the mining circuit. He was also the only exhibitor among the select group of Hollywood insiders who formed the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in the mid-'20s.



Grauman died in 1950, leaving a legacy of significant theatres, great promotions, and millions upon millions of people entertained. His masterful command of the full powers of exhibition not only helped raise the profile of exhibitors everywhere, who strove to match Grauman's every move, but was a quintessential key in the birth of the motion picture industry as we know it today.

GODZILLA: MAN'S BEAST FRIEND

Japan's Fire-Breathing Behemoth Goes Digital Via a New Spin on the Old "Man in a Monster Suit" by Michael J. Payne

A graceful, athletic actor stands on an empty soundstage looking like some futuristic commando. A tight, black bodysuit covers him, encircled with weblike strands of wires that connect 72 light-emitting markers placed at various spots on his body.

"Virtual reality" goggles cover his eyes. Eight specialized cameras—four high and four low—are aimed at him from each of the four walls of the soundstage. To the side, three technicians monitor the actor's movements on a video screen. But what they see on the screen is not a body-suited actor on an empty soundstage. Instead, they see that famous radiation-produced monster known as Godzilla.

As the body-suited actor makes any movement—walking, swinging his arms—the computer-generated Godzilla creature on the video screen makes the same exact movement. In effect, the actor is "performing" Godzilla, live and in real time. If Roland Emmerich, the director of the TriStar summer 1998 release, wants to change the "performance" of his digital monster, he simply tells the actor what he wants to be different and they go ahead and shoot another take immediately.

This real-time computer animation process is known as "motion capture," and it's the latest innovation in the ever-expanding world of digital special effects.

Emmerich and his partner, producer Dean Devlin, have always been on the cutting edge of special effects technology, as shown by their previous efforts together, "Stargate" and "Independence Day." Due to their interest, this particular motion capture system (designed by FutureLight, the R&D division of Santa Monica Studios' visual effects house VisionArt Design & Animation) was created specifically with "Godzilla" in mind. FutureLight's contribution to the multi-dimensional effects palate that will bring Godzilla back to the screen is just one element in a larger effort by effects artisans in a wide range of production houses; their virtual reality puppeteering will make up perhaps only a few moments of screen time. Still, for those with a sense of the Godzilla character's history, this "man in a suit" approach has interesting historic resonances.

"Godzilla" is slated to open on May 20, 1998 (the Wednesday before Memorial Day)—a major vote of confidence from TriStar given that date's traditional "start of summer" status. Its effects will use technologies light years beyond that utilized for 1954's "Gojira" (the original Japanese title). For the past decade, lacking motion capture technology, traditional computer animation (known as "keyframe" animation) has required CGI animators to manipulate their digital creatures by manually imputing geometric data. It's a slow, tedious process; programmers must spell out to the computer each specific movement they want their animated creature to make.

Today's CGI animators don't have things quite that bad; they have to work only on the frames where a movement begins and where it ends (these are called "keyframes"), and then the computer "interpolates" what happens in between (these interpolated frames are appropriately called "in-betweens"). Considering that an animated creature might have two arms, two legs, a tail, and various other moveable limbs (all of which require separately designed keyframes), the human animators still have their hands full.

But this new technology hopes to change all that. Motion capture is exactly that: the computer "captures" the "motion" of the actor wearing the wired-up bodysuit. The 72 light-emitting markers webbed across the actor's body are picked up by the eight specialized cameras on the empty stage. Those cameras aren't actually "filming" the actor; they are recording the geometry of his movements. This geometric data is instantly translated into the live, real-time digital image of Godzilla. Motion capture might be thought of as a computerized version of the man-in-a-rubber-suit process used in the Japanese Godzilla movies.

But while the rubber Godzilla looked phony to many, the images generated by motion capture look at least as good as keyframe animation according to Josh Rose, the executive vice president of Santa Monica Studios. "There are subtleties you get with motion capture that you don't get with keyframes," says Rose. "With keyframe animation, you're making only a percentage of unique frames, and the computer is interpolating—creating all your in-betweens. With motion capture, every frame is a unique frame."

Perhaps motion capture's best feature is the ability to see the animation immediately, in a live, low-resolution image. "It allows the director to actually direct the animation," explains producer Devlin. "With [keyframe animation] you usually have to wait seven weeks to see the animation, and then you can make changes, and then you have to wait another seven weeks to see if it came out right."

But with motion capture's real-time imaging, the director sees the animation as it's being "performed" by the body-suited actor. And the actor also watches the animation in real-time, through the virtual reality goggles he wears. That way, the actor can follow the director's instructions to the letter.

The ability to quickly get the director's seal of approval on an animated shot is a boon to an industry notorious for delays and cost overruns. "You're getting 60 to 80 percent of your work out of the way by using motion capture," Rose says. "It's cheaper, it's more efficient, but most importantly it's aesthetically more pleasing. What has really been incredible for us is seeing the development of this character, and how it goes from being a man in a suit to all of a sudden being Godzilla."

This isn't to say that motion capture will soon replace keyframe animation; there is one little quirk with the process that needs to be ironed out. "Motion Capture tends to look too human," says Volker Engel, the Visual FX Supervisor for "Godzilla," who won an Oscar last year for the special effects on "Independence Day." The analogy to the man-in-a-rubber-suit is ironically accurate, for while motion capture animation looks as photo-realistic as keyframe animation, the movements of the creature are sometimes too human-like.

That's understandable, considering it's a human whose movements are being captured. With this in mind, much of the animation in "Godzilla" will be still done by the older, keyframe process. Volker explains, "When Godzilla is doing subtle movements that look human—for instance, if Godzilla stops and sniffs the air—then we'll use motion capture. For the bigger action scenes, we'll use keyframe."

Producer Devlin agrees. "Motion capture can't be used for every shot, but for certain types of shots, there's nothing better. When Godzilla needs to show emotion and actually 'act,' motion capture is the way to go."

Motion capture technology has actually been around for several years; the process is often used on live TV telecasts, a current example being cable network MSNBC's computer-oriented news show "The Site." But, until recently, the quality of the images generated by motion capture systems has left much to be desired. Something that looks realistic on a 27-inch TV tube can look ridiculous on a 50-foot-high theatrical movie screen, which is why motion capture has rarely been used for features.

The problem is two-fold: the accuracy of tracking the movements of the body-suited actor, and the quantity of how much data can be instantaneously translated into a real-time image. Most motion capture systems use light-reflecting markers on the actor's body to track his movements, but reflected light has a way of scattering, which leads to inaccurate measurements. And the hardware required to translate large quantities of data instantly into a computer-generated real-time image simply didn't exist until the last few years.

But the innovative folks at FutureLight solved these problems when they created their motion capture system. Rose explains, "Ours is an 'active' optical system, which means that we use light-emitting markers [on the actor's body]. They're actually giving off light, as opposed to reflecting light. And the light is only being emitted from a very small marker, [so that] the level of accuracy is into the microns. Sub-millimeter accuracy." This is a vast difference from other such systems which, according to Rose, use markers the size of ping-pong balls.

As for the hardware problems, FutureLight solved them by incorporating computer technology that had been recently designed for, of all things, medicine. "We're the only company using this particular hardware for entertainment motion capture," Rose says. "It was originally developed for medical and aerospace technology. This system revolutionized brain surgery."

Due to the large memory capacity and high speed of the new hardware, FutureLight's motion capture system can handle up to 72 markers—that's 72 different positions on the actor's body that will be tracked and instantly translated to correspond with 72 positions on the digital image of Godzilla. By comparison, most other motion capture systems average only 20 markers.

Another innovation created for FutureLight's system is the ability to see the animated creature in front of the live-action footage that's already been shot for the film. Unlike most similar systems, FutureLight's "medically licensed" hardware is powerful enough to combine together the animation and the background at the same time. Not only does the director see the animated Godzilla on the screen, he also sees the streets of New York that Godzilla is standing on. "Nobody's doing that," Rose says proudly. "It's amazing you can even see it in real time, but we're also providing real time over the background, so that you can make sure that everything—perspective, scale—is working together."

Thanks to FutureLight's improved level of accuracy and their expanded quantity of data that can be processed, motion capture is finally ready for the big screen. And what better film to try out this "man-in-a-suit" technology than "Godzilla?" "We've always said you can't do 'Godzilla' without a man in a suit," laughs producer Devlin. "So we're using a more modern version of the man in a suit."

HOLIDAY IN HELL

Filmmaker Michael Winterbottom Welcomes Audiences to "Sarajevo"

by Sean O'Neill

HOT SET: Stephen Dillane (left) and Woody Harrelson (center) are journalists covering the Bosnian conflict in Miramax's "Welcome to Sarajevo."

Too much of the world, the bloody and horrific conflicts in the region once known as Yugoslavia might have been a minor curiosity—a source of occasional, temporarily sobering dispatches detailing man's capacity for inhumanity, even in Europe, even in the '90s. But then, everywhere but there, that distant war could disappear with the click of a channel changer, replacing scenes of carnage with the easy comfort of a sitcom or game show.

British film director Michael Winterbottom ("Jude"), however, was among those who found he couldn't change the channel. His two-year effort to record one story from that war will reach its culmination on Nov. 14, when Miramax debuts his "Welcome to Sarajevo" in New York and Los Angeles. American actors Woody Harrelson and Marisa Tomei provide supporting turns; English performer Stephen Dillane has the lead role, that of a U.K.-based journalist whose involvement in the war becomes much more personal than he could have foreseen.

"It seemed like what was happening in Bosnia was one of the most important events to have happened in Europe since the Second World War," Winterbottom says during a transatlantic call to BOXOFFICE from London one recent morning. "And the point of the project was to make something that tried to deal with what was happening there and to deal with the attitudes of people living in places like England or America toward it."

The film focuses on foreign journalists covering the conflict, Winterbottom notes. "That was interesting, because it's both about people from the outside who went there at the risk of their lives—a lot of journalists were killed in Sarajevo—while of course also being about the Bosnians who were actually involved in the war. The film had to have a kind of balance between how immediate it was [for the people on the front lines] and how different it was to those of us who watched the stories back at home."

It's odd to think it was only a dozen years ago that Sarajevo proudly hosted the Winter Olympics. But, when Winterbottom and company began making regular pilgrimages to Bosnia in January 1996, less than two months after the signing of the Dayton Accord (which halted the fighting), the landscape was vastly changed from those halcyon days. Nonetheless, even more than the physical devastation, it was the indomitable spirit of the local people that affected the director.

"Despite what happened there, it was actually a very enjoyable place to work," Winterbottom says of the setting for his third feature film. "The people had an incredible kind of spirit. We worked with a lot of Sarajevans, and they were all very cooperative. They wanted their story to be told. Obviously, it was very shocking at times, but one of the positive things was how everyone was trying to live a normal life, have a good time, go out to bars. Sarajevo is a very lively city, a very European city, a very enjoyable city to be in, which makes what happened there even more tragic."

Tragic, and far-reaching. "I'd never been to a city so recently affected by war," Winterbottom says. "Although I'd seen masses of documentary material, I don't think anything can prepare you for going to main streets of town—certain areas, say around the airport—that have been completely destroyed. Our interpreter, who was kind of an adviser for the film, was taking us around, and we were having a nice time, going to coffee bars and restaurants, and then we went past her flat. She lived there through the whole four years of the war, and the place was riddled with what seemed like thousands of shell holes and bullet holes. Her family would just sort of move from room to room, depending on which direction the sniper fire was coming from."

> "It seemed like what was happening in Bosnia was one of the most important events to have happened in Europe since the Second World War."

The film is based on Michael Nicholson's nonfiction work "Natasha's Story," detailing the circumstances under which Nicholson brought back a young female orphan to England and legally adopted her. In choosing to dramatize the Bosnian conflict by telling the story just that way—through a British reporter (now named Michael Henderson) whose character and resolve are challenged when an idle promise that he makes to an orphan of the war-torn country is put to the test—Winterbottom realizes he risks charges of being Anglocentric. But he says he's prepared for such criticism.

"Part of any war like that is that people come from outside to look at it," he says. "And we were outsiders making the film. It's about what it must have been like to be a journalist in that situation, and we see things through their eyes. But I hope it's not a preachy film. It's not meant to be that at all. It's not about how people were for ignoring this situation. When you see TV pictures every day, it's hard to make a distinction—you should feel for these pictures and not those.

"And, unfortunately, you can't say, 'This is what we learn from Bosnia: You must do this or that.' It's hard to go to a city like Sarajevo and not feel there should have been more NATO intervention earlier, but the specifics of any involvement are much more complicated than that. This film is about the experience of individuals.

"You know, you just make films and hope people come to see them. And I hope that people can't help but be moved and involved by these stories," Winterbottom says. "Hopefully, there are enough people out there who still want to be moved by film that this project will be a success."

"Welcome to Sarajevo." Starring Stephen Dillane, Woody Harrelson and Marisa Tomei. Directed by Michael Winterbottom. Written by Frank Cottrell Boyce. Produced by Graham Broadbent and Damian Jones. A Miramax release. Docudrama. Rated R. Opens 11/14 NY/LA.

NOVEMBER TRAILERS

Hollywood's Holidays Are Opening, And It's One Crowded Calendar

Cinema's last big season, summer 1997, began weakly, thanks to less-than-expected performance of much-anticipated sequels. Now come Hollywood's big holidays, and the only mega-sequel for Thanksgiving is "Alien Resurrection." Aside from two remakes—"The Jackal" and "Flubber"—most film fare will be brand-new narratives, needing to go from never-heard-of to must-see status before release.

And many distributors, both major and minor, are opening their releases in a now-or-never wide pattern. Case in point: Nov. 7. Warner ("Mad City") and TriStar ("Starship Troopers") of course target thousands of screens—but so do Trimark and Gramercy.

Things really get arresting—either of the absorbing or heart-stopping variety—during the November's second half, as distributors jockey to gobble their servings of Thanksgiving-time tickets. The 11/21 and 11/28 lineups include, along with "Flubber" and the fourth "Alien" and specialized fare, Fox's animated "Anastasia"; Paramount's "The Rainmaker" from Francis Coppola; New Line's programmer sequel, "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation"; MGM's "Red Corner," starring Richard Gere; and Warner's "The Man Who Knew Too Little," headlining Bill Murray.

But is this so much heavier a bill than was last year's? Well, yes. In 1996, the 11/22 and 11/29 frames sported a total of three major wide releases: "101 Dalmatians," "Star Trek: First Contact" and "Jingle All the Way," just one of which spotted its way to $100+ million glory. And, looking forward, how does Christmas 1997 shape up? A quick glance at this issue's Studio Feature Chart tells the tale: 20 releases in December alone. Here's to hoping that audiences treat this season as holidays of obligation.

Mad City

When he's laid off, a museum staffer (John Travolta) snaps, accidentally shoots a guard and then takes patrons hostage. A tabloid reporter (Dustin Hoffman) decides to exploit the situation. Alan Alda, Mia Kirshner ("Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina") and Blythe Danner co-star. Constantin Costa-Gavras ("Music Box") directs; Tom Matthews (former BOXOFFICE managing editor) and Ebbe Roe Smith ("Falling Down") script; Arnold Kopelson and Anne Kopelson produce. (Warner, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: This comes with an audience-friendly PG-13, even if Costa-Gavras is known for mature fare. But the real sell, of course, is the superstar duo of Travolta and Hoffman. And that'll come in handy, with this film going up against another of the season's big guns—what TriStar hopes is the "Men In Black" of the fall...

Starship Troopers

Based on the Robert A. Heinlein novel, this $90 million sci-fi thriller follows a corps of heroic men and women, all elite members of the Mobile Military, who must wage intergalactic war against aliens. Newcomer Caspar Van Dien, Dina Meyer ("Johnny Mnemonic"), Jake Busey ("Twister"), Neil Patrick Harris (TV's "Doogie Howser, M.D.") and Clancy Brown ("The Shawshank Redemption") star. Paul Verhoeven ("Total Recall") directs; Ed Neumeier scripts; Alan Marshall and Jon Davison produce. (TriStar, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: A co-production with Buena Vista's Touchstone label, this big-budgeter could be a significant boxoffice factor through Thanksgiving and—depending on response to the similar-genre "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation" and "Alien Resurrection"—on toward Christmas. Despite his misstep with "Showgirls," Verhoeven has shown a facility with SF material. Given the casting, it's that genre that's the star, and the Heinlein name is a hallowed one among SF fans.

Eve's Bayou

In this drama, a 10-year-old girl tells the story of her eccentric Louisiana family. Samuel L. Jackson ("A Time to Kill") and Lynn Whitfield ("A Thin Line Between Love and Hate") star. Actress Kasi Lemmons ("Fear of a Black Hat") directs and scripts; Samuel L. Jackson produces with Caldecot Chubb ("The Crow"). (Trimark, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: Although with "Meet Wally Sparks" and "Chairman of the Board" it's now (if hesitantly) a wide-release player, Trimark continues to handle specialized fare, and this one counterprograms the date's other offerings. Expect the Jackson and Whitfield names to attract black audiences; rating allowing, urban families might give this a try.

Bean

Brit TV superstar Rowan Atkinson brings his Bean character to the bigscreen in a screwball comedy about his antics as a (dis)reputed art expert. Peter MacNicol and Harris Yulin (both "Ghostbusters II") and Burt Reynolds co-star. Mel Smith ("The Tall Guy") directs; Richard Curtis and Rowan Atkinson (both also "The Tall Guy") script with Robin Driscoll; "French Kiss" duo Tim Bevan and Eric Fellner produce for their Working Title label with Peter Bennett-Jones. (Gramercy, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: Our 3 1/2-star review (Sept. issue) calls "Bean" (held from 10/17) "an incredibly entertaining piece of comic mayhem." U.S. fans of his PBS series are likely ticketbuyers; to pull wider, stage a Bean or Whistler's Mother lookalike contest—or go for media attention with a charity Whistler's Mother dunking throw.

The Wings of the Dove

Adapted by Hossein Amini ("Jude") from Henry James' turn-of-the-century romantic novel and set in London and Venice, this latest from director Iain Softley ("BackBeat," "Hackers") tells the story of a young woman (Helena Bonham Carter) from a wealthy family who falls in love with a poor journalist ("Priest's" Linus Roache). To keep him and her social standing, she asks him to romance a beautiful but dying American heiress ("The Spitfire Grill's" Alison Elliot) so they can inherit her fortune. Unexpected consequences ensue for all. David Parfitt ("Mary Shelley's Frankenstein") and Stephen Evans ("Much Ado About Nothing") produce. (Miramax, 11/7 NY/LA)

Exploitips: The season's first key specialized title, this R-rater (for sexuality) has a good cast and producer team and a hip director (who's batting 1-for-2, though). Bookstore tie-ins will help draw the likely distaff crowd.

Hugo Pool

In this absurdist comedy, Alyssa Milano ("Fear") stars as Hugo, a pool cleaner with odd clients (the likes of Robert Downey Jr., Malcolm McDowell, Cathy Moriarty and Sean Penn). Robert Downey Sr. ("Putney Swope") directs, and co-scripts with his late wife Laura Downey; Barbara Ligeti ("Motorama") produces. (First Look, 11/7 NY/LA)

Exploitips: First Look moved "Mrs. Dalloway" off this date to February, probably fearing the novel-based period piece would battle for its audience with "The Wings of the Dove." "Hugo Pool" is much different in sensibility, so sell the contemporary angle to maximize younger specialized turnout.

Sick

Subtitled "The Life and Death of Bob Flanagan, Supermasochist," this documentary tells of the life and profession of the late performance artist Bob Flanagan, whose disturbing routine involved self-torture. Kirby Dick directs. (CFP, 11/8 NY/LA)

Exploitips: To build hypable avant-garde buzz, highlight the subject's "sickness."

A Further Gesture

Playing a hard-luck Irishman, Stephen Rea ("Michael Collins") exits the Emerald Isle for New York City, only to become involved in an attempted assassination. (Castle Hill, ltd)

Exploitips: Given a certain popularity of Irish-themed films stateside, the Irish element and Rea's name are the sells.

The Knowledge of Healing

This documentary focuses on Tanzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama. Frank Reichley directs. (IN, 11/5 NY)

Exploitips: This is nicely timed to split the calendar between the Tibet-themed "Seven Years in Tibet" and "Kundun."

NOVEMBER 14

The Jackal

In this "The Day of the Jackal" variant, a ruthless killer (Bruce Willis) known as The Jackal is on a global murder mission; to track him down, an FBI deputy director (Sidney Poitier) and a Russian officer (Diane Venora) enlist the aid of an imprisoned IRA terrorist (Richard Gere). Michael Caton-Jones ("Rob Roy") directs; Chuck Pfarrer ("Barb Wire") and Kevin Jarre ("The Devil's Own") script; both of "Michael," James Jacks and Sean Daniel produce. (Universal, 11/14)

Exploitips: The A-list teaming of Willis and Gere can be counted on to draw both genders and expand ticket sales beyond thriller-genre fans, although an R rating (for strong violence and language) will limit below-17 turnout—who will likely be reboarding "Starship Troopers'" anyway. Key competition will be weekend #2 of the similar-demo "Mad City."

The Little Mermaid

The story of a beautiful young mermaid named Ariel, who longs to be human, and her handsome prince is told again in this reissue of the 1989 Disney animated film, based on Hans Christian Andersen tale. Voices by Rene Auberjonois, Jodi Benson, Buddy Hackett, Kenneth Mars and Edie McClurg. John Musker and Ron Clements (the "Hercules" duo) direct and script; Musker produces with the late Howard Ashman. Alan Menken does the Oscar-winning score; another Oscar went to the Ashman/Menken song "Under the Sea." (Buena Vista, 11/14)

Exploitips: Even as the first of the new Disney's big animation successes (it did $84 million), this G-rater is likely to have just one big weekend. Though non-Disney, with all the perils that portends, Fox's new "Anastasia" is directly targeted at young girls come 11/21—and then Disney trumps itself with "Flubber" the following week. One can still expect continued play through the holidays.

One Night Stand

The latest from Oscar-nom'd filmmaker Mike Figgis ("Leaving Las Vegas") is a romantic drama about a married man who has what he thinks will be a one-night stand with a married woman. Unable to forget her, he tries to rekindle the romance—with unexpected consequences. Wesley Snipes, Nastassja Kinski ("Fathers' Day"), Robert Downey Jr. (also in "Hugo Pool"), Kyle MacLachlan ("Showgirls") and Ming-Na Wen ("The Joy Luck Club") star. Figgis scripts (Joe Eszterhas originated), and he produces with Annie Stewart and Ben Myron. (New Line, 11/14 300 runs)

Exploitips: Even in this era, the black/white romantic casting might put off regional audiences, so expect best results in urban areas—thus the limited opening—and with the distaff demo. Snipes has a following, and the Figgis name (thanks to the Academy and public attentions to "Leaving Las Vegas") could draw crossover audiences. Rated R for strong sexuality and language, and for drug content.

Oscar and Lucinda

Brought together in love and guilt by a shared passion for gambling, a British priest ("The English Patient's" Ralph Fiennes) and an Australian glassworks heiress (Cate Blanchett) decide to work together to transport a glass church by river to a remote Down Under parish. Tom Wilkinson and Clive Russell co-star. Gillian Armstrong ("Little Women") directs; Laura Jones ("High Tide") adapts Peter Carey's Booker Prize-winning novel; "Cosi's" Timothy White produces with Robin Dalton. (Fox Searchlight, 11/14)

Exploitips: The arthouse crowd will have two key choices this weekend; expect the more mature set to opt for "Oscar and Lucinda," while the younger go for the more politically current "Welcome to Sarajevo." The Armstrong and Aussie pedigrees will pull the "My Brilliant Career"/"Shine" types (at $13 mil., this is very expensive Down Under fare), but the best bet for broadening the audience is to highlight Fiennes' presence, last onscreen exactly a year ago with the hit "The English Patient."

Welcome to Sarajevo

British and American journalists, including a female producer ("Shallow Grave's" Kerry Fox), a novice reporter (Emily Lloyd) and a jaded writer (Woody Harrelson), cover the war in Bosnia. For one—U.K. correspondent Michael Henderson (stage actor Stephen Dillane)—it becomes personal when he, helped by an American aid worker (Marisa Tomei), decides to smuggle to safety a little orphan girl. Michael Winterbottom ("Jude") directs; Frank Cottrell Boyce scripts; Graham Broadbent and Damian Jones produce. See Sneak Preview in this issue. (Miramax, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In our 3 1/2-star review (July issue), our Cannes critic called this docudrama "a complex, deeply moving story...an extraordinarily affecting, personal, and at times uplifting tale." Winterbottom's camera is candid: The film is rated R for brutal images/war atrocities and language. Expect the younger brood among arthouse audiences to favor this, given its topicality, while the older opt for "Oscar and Lucinda."

The Tango Lesson

Filmmaker Sally Potter ("Orlando") recounts her romantic involvement with Argentine tango dancer Pablo Veron and her multicontinental efforts to make a film about the Latin dance. Christopher Sheppard (also "Orlando") produces. (Sony Classics, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Potter's challenging "Orlando" grossed a good $7 million take in 1993, and highlighting that credit could draw arthouse audiences that might otherwise be resistant to dance fare. Though "Orlando" would hardly have filled the bill, "The Tango Lesson"—rated a promotable PG (for brief language and some violent images)—might allow outreach to local art programs for exhibitors eager to take advantage of the age-friendly rating.

Slaves to the Underground

In this drama set against the slacker music scene of Seattle, a love affair between two all-girl rock group bandmates (Molly Gross and "Love Always'" Marisa Ryan) runs aground when one of the gals runs into her ex-boyfriend (Jason Bortz) and their relationship reignites. Documentarian Kristine Peterson directs, and she produces with Bill Cody and Raquel Caballes Maxwell; Bill Cody scripts. (First Look, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In our 1 1/2-star review (April issue), our Women in Cinema/Seattle fest critic had a number of problems with "Slaves to the Underground"; still, on an arthouse-heavy weekend, this R-rater (for strong sexuality and language) could successfully skew to younger female/lesbian auds unserved elsewhere.

ANASTASIA

Meg Ryan voices the title character in this animated interpretation of the life of Czarevna Anostosia, daughter of Russia's last Czar, Nicholas II, who might have escaped alive the killing of the royal family in 1917 during the Bolshevik Revolution. In this telling, a girl who remembers nothing of her heritage follows a clue to Paris in an attempt to find her identity; the evil Rasputin pursues her, and a charming conman befriends her. Kelsey Grammer, Angela Lansbury, John Cusack and Christopher Lloyd provide other voices. Don Bluth and Gary Goldman, the team for "An American Tail" and "All Dogs Go to Heaven," direct and produce; Eric Tuchman, Susan Gauthier and Bruce Graham script. (Fox, 11/21 wide)

Exploitips: Like DreamWorks, Fox is going heavy into animation—even as recent Disney animated fare has been struggling to reach the once-easy $100 million mark. This $50+ million effort is the studio's first out of its new Arizona facility, and although it's likely to pull the family demo in general it trends toward the little-girl side in particular—the same group that Disney satisfied just last weekend with its "The Little Mermaid" reissue. Yet the advantage should be "Anastasia's," given that it's a new entry opening at the start of the Thanksgiving school break.

The Rainmaker

Adapted from John Grisham's 1995 best-seller, this David and Goliath tale follows the struggles of a recent law-school graduate ("Courage Under Fire's" Matt Damon) pitted against an unscrupulous insurance industry giant and a big-name law firm. Claire Danes ("William Shakespeare's Romeo & Juliet"), Danny DeVito, Jon Voight ("Most Wanted"), Danny Glover (also in "Switchback"), Virginia Madsen ("Ghosts of Mississippi") and Mickey Rourke co-star. Francis Ford Coppola directs and scripts; Michael Douglas and Steven Reuther produce for Douglas/Reuther

LATE MOVIE MOVES...

RTY DANCING

Patrick Swayze stars in this ssue of the 1987 hit as the nce instructor who makes the itskills summer of a coming- age girl (Jennifer Grey) into e time of her life. (Live, 8/22)

Exploitips: This PG-13 effort uld benefit from its end-of- mmer timing for girls.

EXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE: IE NEW GENERATION

Four teens (including "Jerry aguire's" Renee Zellweger) ise on prom night in a small xas town, unaware a psycha ller ("Contact's" Matthew cConaughey) is on the loose. m Henkel (who wrote "Texas hainsaw Massacre") directs nd scripts. (CFP, 8/29)

Exploitips: In a two-star re- ew, our critic says the main traction will be Zellweger and cConaughey, both become ars since this 1994 shoot.

ULIAN PO

A young man on the road Christian Slater) finds woman ouble in a small town. Alan Vade directs and scripts. (Fine ne, 9/5 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Slater's recent ar- est in L.A. for an alleged Mike yson-like altercation might ise the press profile here.

IDING THE RAILS

This documentary recounts obo life in the Great Depres- on. Michael Uys and Lexy Lovell irect, script and produce. (Artis- c License, 9/5 LA, 9/12 NY)

Exploitips: Our four-star re- iew (July) called this "moving...a oving cinematic tapestry."

RACKING UP

This comedy/drama tells the agi-comic story of the down- all of a struggling actor. Matt Mitler stars, directs, scripts and roduces. (Phaedra, 9/12)

A teenager enters a fantasy vorld when he discovers a de- erted summer home. Peter Hall irects. (Rice Arts, 9/12 LA)

Exploitips: The sexual-matur- ng theme is universal and pro- ocative. To draw the MTV demo, highlight the score by British rockers Gang of Four.

MY SEX LIFE

This French-language comedy tells the story of an assistant professor (Mathieu Amalric) unhappy in learning and love. Arnaud Desplechin directs and co-scripts. (Zeitgeist, 9/17 NY)

Exploitips: In a three-star review (Aug. '96), our Cannes critic cited an engaging cast and script as the best elements.

ANTHEM

This videotape documentary recounts the find-the-American-Dream travels of filmmakers Shainee Gabel and Kristin Hahn. (Zeitgeist, 9/19 NY)

Exploitips: Our four-star review (Sept.) called this "a vital and unique testament."

AARON'S MAGIC VILLAGE

This animated film adapts Nobel winner Isaac Bashevis Singer's classic "Stories for Children." French director Albert Hanan Kaminski ("Sesame Street") helms and scripts; Oscar winner Michael Legrand composes. (CFP, 9/19 ltd)

Exploitips: Try outreach efforts to local Jewish groups.

CONSPIRATORS OF PLEASURE

This comedy is the latest from Czech animator Jan Svankmajer. (Zeitgeist, 9/19 LA)

Exploitips: After a quiet couple of years, Zeitgeist (like New Yorker) is growing its portfolio.

NO WAY HOME

A prison inmate on his release makes a disturbing discovery when he joins his brother and sister-in-law. Tim Roth, James Russo and Deborah Unger star. Buddy Giovazzo directs. (Live, Sept. undated)

Exploitips: The strongest element is the Roth name.

LA RENCONTRE

French filmmaker Alain Cavalier uses objects and conversations to tell the story of a relationship. (Artistic License, Sept. undated)

Exploitips: Our Telluride critic gave this a two-star review; see our March issue.

JBL Professional is an equal opportunity employer, offers a competitive salary and a comprehensive benefits package.

Prods. with American Zoetrope. See this issue's Cover Story. (Paramount, 11/21)

Exploitips: This is the seventh Grisham-based film in just five years, and the last one ("The Chamber") was received coolly. Given "A Time to Kill's" response, though, that might have been an aberration rather than a sign of audience overdose. Expectations are that Damon might be the next McConaughey (who leaped to fame with "A Time to Kill"), and the supporting cast is solid. Of course, Coppola remains a name that draws attention.

Mortal Kombat: Annihilation

A group of courageous warriors must survive new challenges when they do battle with an evil warlord who wants to rule Earth. Christopher Lambert, Robin Shou and Talisa Soto return for the sequel; supermodel Irina Pantaeva co-stars. John Leonetti ("Child's Play 3") directs; Brent V. Friedman ("Hellbound") scripts with Bryce Zable; Larry Kasanoff produces. (New Line, 11/21 wide)

Exploitips: "Mortal Kombat," directed by Paul Anderson, generated $70.4 million in summer '95. This second iteration, originally skedded for August (when New Line successfully birthed "Spawn"), should draw the same arcade/videogame aficionados hitting the malls over the Thanksgiving break.

Liar

In this psychological thriller, a Charleston blueblood ("Hoodlum's" Tim Roth) who might have brutally killed a prostitute ("Jerry Maguire's" Renee Zellweger) uses his bril-

Slaper, whose birth caused her mother's death and whase life her wealthy father has never forgiven her for. Jennifer Jason Leigh and Albert Finney star. Agnieszka Holland ("Total Eclipse") directs the Caravan production. (Buena Vista, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: Buena Vista advanced "Washington Square's" release date, perhaps to take advantage of good press generated at the Toronto fest. Exhibitors might be wary of the Caravan name (think "Gone Fishin'"), but this is excellent filmmaking; see our review, this issue.

Most Wanted

In this R-rated action/adventure, a Gulf War hero ("Glimmer Man's" Keenen Ivory Wayans) is framed far assassinating the First Lady. He must find an eyewitness (Jill Hennessey) to clear his name. Eric Roberts, Paul Sorvino and Jon Voight co-star. David Hogan ("Barb Wire") directs; Wayans scripts. (New Line, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: The casting, rating and genre make this fare for twentysomething and urban males, so highlight the presence of Wayans, whose late-night talk show has raised his profile with that demo further.

Marian

In this Czech-language drama, institutionalized violence and abuse leads an abandoned gypsy boy to grow up to be a criminal. Petr Vaclav directs and co-scripts. (Turbulent Arts, 10/3 Chi)

Exploitips: Our Toronto critic gave this a one-star review (April), but this promotably won a Silver Leopard at the Locarno fest.

Nick and Jane

An executive and a cab driver try to make love work. Dana Wheeler-Nicholson and James McCaffrey star. Rich Mauro directs and co-scripts. (CFP, 10/10)

Exploitips: Our Santa Barbara critic gave this two stars (June '96); still, everyone loves a love story, so hype the genre.

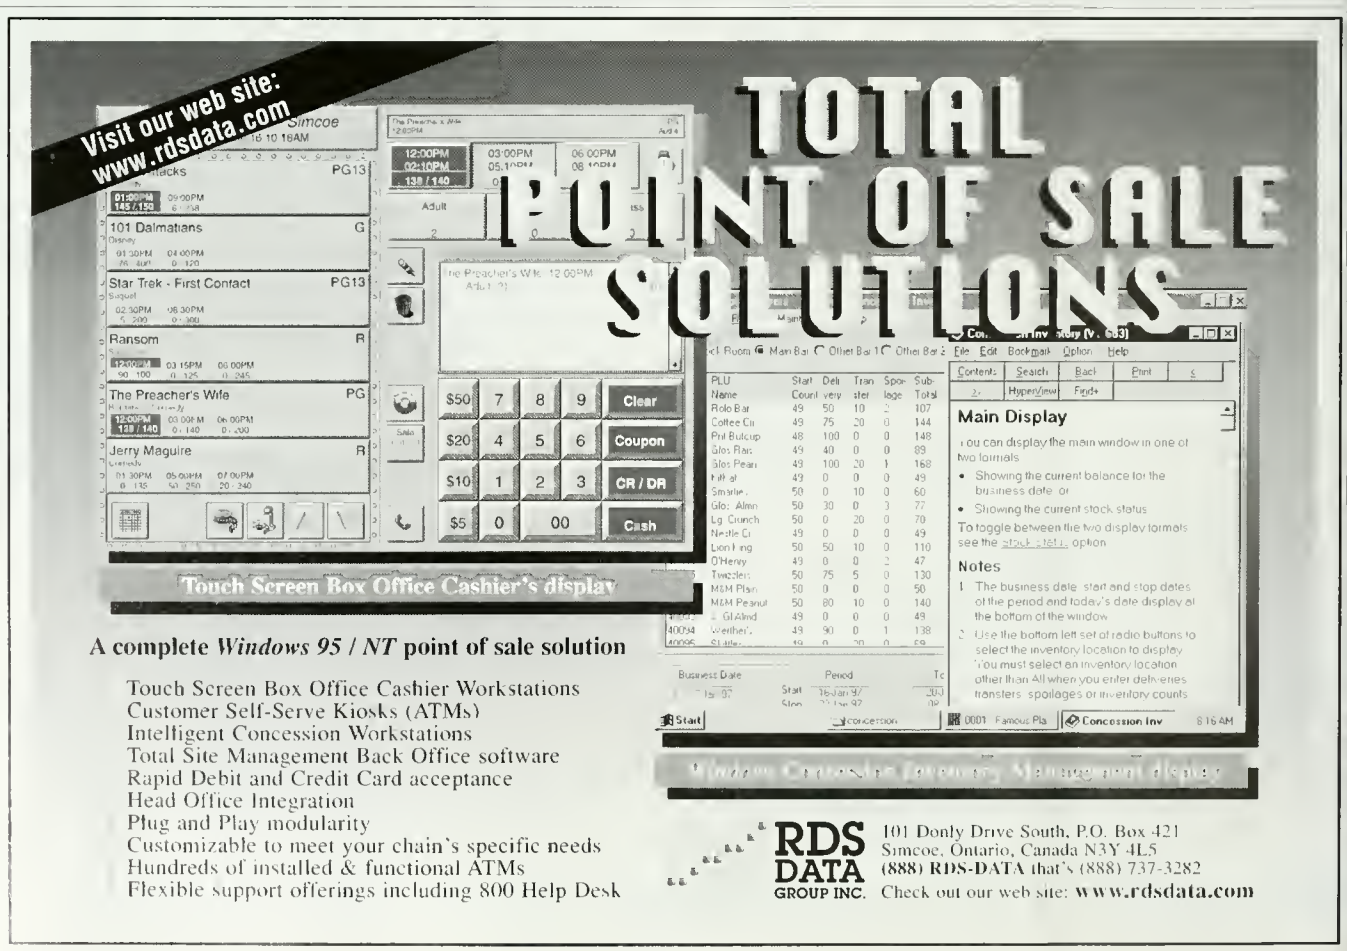
Beaumarchais



This French-language comedy set in 1770s France tells the story of the humbly-born man who grew into a writer, inventor, businessman and court favorite. Fabrice Luchini, Sandrine Kiberlain and Manuel Blanc star. Edouard Milinaro directs and co-scripts. (New Yorker, 10/24)

Exploitips: See our four-star review in this issue. New Yorker has been expanding, and this looks to be a triumph for the small house, which advanced this when indie fare looked headed for a Christmas crush.

Son of Gascogne

Jean-Claude Dreyfus stars in this French comedy. Pascal Aubier directs. (Filmpolis, 10/24)

Exploitips: Highlight the film's French-language nature and its comedy genre to attract the more light-hearted sophisticates among the arthouse set.

SWITCHBACK

In this R-rated thriller (aka "Going West in America"), a serial killer is being tracked by an FBI agent. Dennis Quaid and Danny Glover star for debut director Jeb Stuart (scripter of "Die Hard"). Gale Anne Hurd produces. (Paramount, 10/31)

Exploitips: Now set to open vs. the similar-genre "Incognito," this might move to 11/7—but the draw is even worse there.

HAPPY TOGETHER

Asian sex symbols Leslie Cheung and Tony Leung Chiu-Wai star as gay lovers in a tumultuous relationship. Wong Kar-Wai directs. (Kino, Oct. undated NY)

Exploitips: This nabbed a best director prize at Cannes, though our reviewer (Sept.) accorded the film just two stars.

TELLING LIES IN AMERICA

Kevin Bacon and Brad Renfro star in this story of a Hungarian immigrant boy's experiences in America. Screenwriter Joe Eszterhas ("Showgirls," usw) bases this personal tale on his childhood. (Banner, Oct. undated ltd, mid-Nov. exp)

Exploitips: The Bacon, Renfro and Eszterhas names will raise this one's profile.

FORGOTTEN SILVER

Co-directors/scripters Peter Jackson ("The Frighteners") and Costa Botes spoof the craze for discovering obscure films and neglected filmmakers in this mockumentary about a New Zealand film pioneer who used sound and color in movies years before Hollywood. (First Run, Oct. undated NY)

Exploitips: We gave this a 3 1/2-star review (March). Exhibitors might also program shorts; "Forgotten Silver" runs 52 min.

A GUN FOR JENNIFER

Producer/co-scripter Deborah Twiss stars as a battered housewife who takes up with vicious women. (Greycat, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: Expect a mature female turnout here, though males might be intrigued.

THE BUTCHER BOY

In a small Irish town in the early 1960s, a young boy (Eamon Owens) with an alcoholic father ("Michael Collins'" Stephen Rea) and a manic-depressive mother (Aisling O'Sullivan) but one good friend (Alan Boyle) has his life turn for the worse when all three exit his life. Neil Jordan (also "Michael Collins") directs and produces, and he scripts with Patrick McCabe. (Warner Bros., fall)

Exploitips: In a four-star review (Sept. issue), our Galway fest critic said Jordan's 10th film is "an extraordinary piece of cinema.... [N]ot only are the performances stunning; so is Jordan's direction, of the caliber that says 'Oscar.'" The R rating makes this one for adult audiences, probably in the same number that attended "Michael Collins" ($11 million).

liance to play mental games with two detectives ("Mulholland Falls'" Chris Penn and "Trigger Effect's" Michael Rooker). Ellen Burstyn and Rosanna Arquette co-star. Jonas and Josh Pate direct and script; Peter Glatzer produces for MDP. (MGM, 11/21 ltd)

Exploitips: An acquisition to help fill out the Lion's slate, "Liar" (a tentative title) faces no new genre competition on its limited rollout, though it will have to battle holdover business for the higher-wattage "The Jackal." As leads, the players here are more arthouse names, so expect a specialized level of turnout. Some extra media attention is likely given the fact that the directors are twins.

Matchmaker

When a jaded political professional ("The Truth about Cats and Dogs'" Janeane Garofalo) arrives in Ireland to track down the homespun Irish relatives of a senator (Jay O. Sanders) to help his U.S. re-election campaign, she finds herself in the middle of an annual matchmaking festival. Romantic complications ensue. David O'Hara, Denis Leary ("Wide Awake") and Milo O'Shea co-star. Mark Joffe directs; the "Father Ted" duo, Karen Janszen and Louis Nowra, script; Eric Fellner and Tim Bevan ("Bean") and Luc Roeg produce for Working Title. (Gramercy, 11/21)

Exploitips: Despite the sleeper status of her Fox hit, Garofalo is not a mainstream marquee pull; that and the foreign setting make "Matchmaker" (aka "The Strangest Places") something of a specialty title. That element—along with its salable romance genre—means the film's key competition will be...

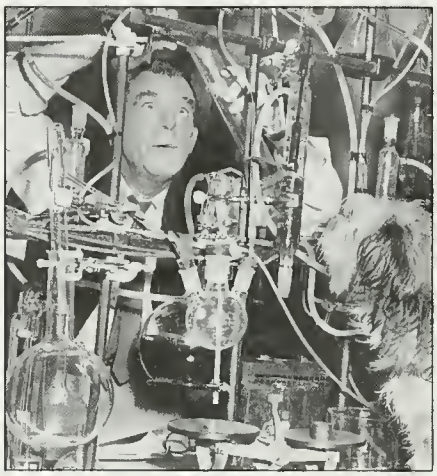
Sliding Doors



Gwyneth Paltrow ("Emma") stars in this contemporary love story about Helen, a young woman whose destiny is about to be changed by the sliding doors of a London subway train. From that moment, the film bisects to tell the two parallel stories of what happens if Helen makes the train and if she doesn't. John Hannah, John Lynch ("Nothing Personal") and Jeanne Tripplehorn ("'Til There Was You") co-star. Peter Howitt directs and scripts; Sydney Pollack produces for Mirage with William Horberg and Philippa Braithwaite. (Miramax, 11/21 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Like "Matchmaker," this will be distaff-driven. Given the similarity of the two film's elements (genre, setting, lead's gender), the boxoffice question could come down to Paltrow vs. Garofalo. That, plus Miramax's marketing power, could give "Sliding Doors" the advantage in its markets.

Flubber

Robin Williams takes on the role originated by Fred MacMurray (see photo) in this remake of the 1961 family comedy "The Absent-Minded Professor." Williams plays a scientist who invents Flubber (a rubbery substance with anti-gravity powers); Christopher MacDonald ("The Rich Man's Wife") plays the prof's nemesis who tries to purloin the putty. Marcia Gay Harden ("The First Wives Club") plays his long-suffering fiancee, now updated to college president, and there's a flying robot assistant named WEEBO. Les Mayfield ("Encino Man") directs; John Hughes scripts, and he produces with former Hollywood Pictures head Ricardo Mestres. (Buena Vista, 11/26)

Exploitips: Four years (and two days) ago, Williams and Hughes protege Chris Columbus launched the family comedy "Mrs. Doubtfire" to Thanksgiving-through-New Year success and a very domestic $220 million. Clearly, Disney hopes for that kind of number, vs. that for its previous Williams starrer, the 8/96 "Jack" ($59 million). The chances? Especially given its predictable PG rating (for slapstick action and mild language), not bad. Expect "Alien Resurrection" and "Red Corner" to draw the non-competing SF and adult demos, and the same-genre "The Man Who Knew Too Little" to perhaps prove its title by going up against "Flubber."

Alien Resurrection

Sigourney Weaver as Ripley again battles malevolent extraterrestrials in this fourth installment of the "Alien" franchise. This time out, evil scientists clone our hero to access the alien queen that died inside her body when Ripley suicided in "Alien^3." Winona Ryder co-stars with Dan Hedaya, Brad Dourif and two from "The City of Lost Children," Ron Perlman and Dominique Pinon. Jean-Pierre Jeunet (also "The City of Lost Children") directs; Joss Whedon ("Toy Story") scripts; David Giler, Walter Hill, Gordon Carroll and Bill Badalato produce. (Fox, 11/26)

Exploitips: Fox goes for the gusto in its directing choices for this franchise. Though the artfully dark vision of David Fincher (who went on to make "Seven") of 1992's "Alien^3" didn't win wide audience support, the studio (after winning and then losing "Shallow Grave's" Danny Boyle) went with Jeunet, whose offkilter vision (with co-director Marc Caro) drew foreign-language fans to "The City of Lost Children" and "Delicatessen." Will the arthouse aficionado fare well on the megaplex screen? That this is one of only two sequels this month should help; even as "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation" draws younger, this R-rater (for strong sci-fi violence and gore, some grotesque images and language) should trend older.

Red Corner

In this thriller, a savvy entertainment lawyer (Richard Gere) comes to China to broker a big TV deal. While celebrating, he seduces a beautiful Chinese woman. Awaking the next morning, he finds himself accused of raping nd murdering her. Caught in a legal system at affords no presumption of innocence and ven a skeptical court-appointed attorney (Bai ng), he faces imminent execution. Jon Avnet The War") directs, and he produces with rdan Kerner, Rosalie Swedlin and Charles ulvehill; Ron Koslow ("Last Dance") scripts ith Robert King. (MGM/UA, 11/26)

Exploitips: This could be a bit boxed into a orner, Gere having just appeared earlier this nonth in "The Jackal" and the similar-demo Alien Resurrection" boasting a presold title. vnet (who also directed "Fried Green Toma- oes") makes quality films, though, so this ould benefit from word of mouth.

he Man Who Knew Too Little

Aka "Watch That Man," this caper comedy ells the story of an American (Bill Murray) who attends a London interactive stage show hat puts participants in the middle of crime-olving adventures. Without his knowledge, he Yank becomes embroiled in a real case of nternational espionage. Peter Gallagher ("To Gillian on Her 37th Birthday") and Joanne Whalley ("Trial by Jury") co-star for director on Amiel, with whom they worked on "Tune n Tomorrow" and "The Singing Detective," espectively. Robert Farrar adapts his novel; on Amiel produces with Mark Tarlov, Mi-hael Nathanson and Arnon Milchan for New Legency. (Warner Bros., 11/28)

Exploitips: Amiel ("Copycat," "Sommers-by") is adept at various genres; the question mark is whether the talented Murray, of Ghostbusters" and "Groundhog Day" fame, can draw substantial audiences after "King-pin" and "Larger Than Life." Despite the rating here, PG (for language, innuendo, comic violence and sensuality), the release timing against "Flubber" virtually precludes family attendance, so try to maximize turnout by teenagers resistant to the Disney name.

NOVEMBER UNDATED

Kiss or Kill

Down Under helmer Bill Bennett ("Two If By Sea") directs "Love and Other Catastrophes'" Frances O'Connor and Matt Day in this dramatic thriller about a grifter couple running from police across Australia's Nullarbor Desert. When a series of murders occur along their route, each suspects the other. Bennett also scripts and produces. (October Films, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Emphasize the Aussie heritage of this arthouse entry, along with its genre.

Body Count

A "Jade" re-teaming, Linda Fiorentino and David Caruso star in this film about an art heist gone wrong. Ving Rhames ("Rosewood"), Forest Whitaker ("Species"), John Leguizamo ("The Pest") and Donnie Wahlberg ("Ransom") co-star. Robert Patton Spruill ("The Squeeze") directs. (Gramercy, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Unlike the similar-genre "Kiss or Kill," this has salable stateside star wattage; expect some crossover. Rated R (for strong violence and pervasive strong language).

The Leading Man

In this drama set amid London's theatre world, a playwright (Lambert Wilson) sleeping with his leading lady ("The Journey of August King's" Thandie Newton) asks his leading man ("Moonlight & Valentino's" Jon Bon Jovi) to sleep with his Italian wife ("The Hairdresser's Husband's" Anna Galiena)—to unexpected results. John Duigan (also "The Journey of August King") directs; Virginia Duigan scripts; Bertil Ohlsson and Paul Raphael produce. (Legacy, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Screened at the 1996 Toronto fest, "The Leading Man" won a three-star review from our critic, who said that the film is "fresh and unpredictable" and that rocker-turned-actor Bon Jovi in "the Sting role" has "genuine presence and charm."

BEAUMARCHAIS, THE SCOUNDREL ★★★★

Starring Fabrice Luchini, Sandrine Kiberlain and Manuel Blanc. Directed by Edouard Molinaro. Written by Edouard Molinaro and Jean-Clause Brisville. Produced by Charles Gassot. A New Yorker release. Comedy. Not yet rated. French-language; English subtitles. Running time: 100 min. Opens 10/24 NY/LA.

In 1770s France lived an intriguing fellow known as Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais. Though of, as they say, humble birth, he was a brilliant writer, inventor and shrewd businessman, and he married well—twice (both ladies unfortunately expiring shortly after the ceremonies). His title was a purchased one, and he climbed his way into court circles, but he also was a relentless gadfly and critic of the aristocracy.

BOWING "BEAUMARCHAIS": Fabrice Luchini stars in the New Yorker release.

Between stints in the Bastille for his insolence, he spied for the Crown, smuggled arms to the American Revolutionary Army, had affairs, and wrote the wildly popular, poetically subversive comedy "The Marriage of Figaro," which was banned by both Louis XVI and Hitler. His life reads like a James Bond movie in a powdered wig—and now it is.

"Beaumarchais, the Scoundrel" is a lush, lavishly mounted costumer that is simply a hoot from beginning to end. Like the main character, it is sly and funny and whip-smart but never takes itself too seriously—combining the French-court intellectual intrigue of "Dangerous Liaisons" with the bravura, breezy dash of "Tom Jones." Director/co-scripter Edouard Molinaro achieves the historical/costume filmmaking grail: connecting the audience to the schoolbook characters onscreen not by making them modern but by making them human and real. One small setpiece has Beaumarchais meet with Ben Franklin, and as presented here Poor Richard is a study in eccentricity that will leave no moviegoer looking at a hundred-dollar bill in quite the same way again.

Although "Beaumarchais" sometimes plays a bit fast and loose with history, the film succeeds not only as a work of entertainment but also as a tease that makes one want to find out more about the man and his world. It presents the Age of Enlightenment as an attractive, smart, dangerous place. Hell, it makes you want to read a copy of "The Marriage of Figaro."—Alex Albanese

TORONTO

FAIRYTALE: A TRUE STORY ★★★★

Starring Florence Hoath, Elizabeth Earl, Peter O'Toole and Harvey Keitel. Directed by Charles Sturridge. Written by Ernie Contreras. Produced by Wendy Finerman and Bruce Davey. A Paramount release. Fantasy. Rated PG for brief mild language. Running time: 98 min. Opens 10/24.

In the manner of the best children's works, "FairyTale: A True Story" has a motif-packed opening section. Very quickly, the audience of this Charles Sturridge ("Where Angels Fear to Tread") film begins to feel they're in the process of watching something special.

For the most part, this Icon production is exactly that. The story—which scripter Ernie Contreras bases on real-life events—is about two young cousins, Elsie and Frances (newcomers Florence Hoath and Elizabeth Earl), who produce photographs of fairies that become the center of worldwide controversy in this century's second decade. Wisely, the filmmakers avoid the global scope, preferring quiet conversation in the intimacy of the little girls' shared room and such telling considerations as a tiny empty treehouse built for the fairies by Elsie's now-dead brother. (Frances has emotional trauma too: Her father, away in the Great War, is missing in action.)

Even more than "A Little Princess," which famously opened to lavish praise and empty theatres, this movie has a complexity of character and concept that works against a simple emotional payoff onscreen. Instead, "FairyTale: A True Story" comes close to achieving the cinematic sublime: Being a film for all ages for the ages.—Kim Williamson

IN AND OUT ★★★

Starring Kevin Kline, Joan Cusack, Tom Selleck and Matt Dillon. Directed by Frank Oz. Written by Paul Rudnick. Produced by Scott Rudin. A Paramount release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for sexual content and some strong language. Running time: 90 min.

Surprisingly hilarious at some turns and overly simple at others, "In and Out" fades in and out in terms of its success as a comedy. Peppered liberally with celebrity cameos, it's a small film made to feel big while still seeming off the beaten path. The story is about a well-liked English teacher, Howard Brackett (Kevin Kline), whose impending marriage, peaceful life and personal emotions are thrown into turmoil when he is mistakenly "outed" by a former local boy-turned-superstar actor (Matt Dillon) during his Oscar acceptance speech for his portrayal of a gay war hero.

Howard tries eliminating some of his more effeminate mannerisms to help squelch the rumors, but that task proves easier said than done for this die-hard Barbra Streisand devotee. Even as Howard must sort through his own feelings, the situation is further complicated by his insecure fiancee (Joan Cusack), who's freaking out, the high school principal (Bob Newhart), who's covertly threatening Brackett's job, and by the town's populace, whose reactions are mixed.

There's not a lot of plot momentum and the denouement is a bit simplistic and patronizing, but this light-hearted fare has enough fun moments and witty social-commentary barbs to make it worthwhile—not to mention the fact that it features one of the funniest and most unexpected screen kisses in film history.—Christine James

WASHINGTON SQUARE ★★★1/2

Starring Jennifer Jason Leigh, Albert Finney, Ben Chaplin and Maggie Smith. Directed by Agnieszka Holland. Written by Carol Doyle. Produced by Roger Birnbaum and Julie Bergman Sender. A Buena Vista release. Drama. Rated PG for thematic elements including some sensuality, a childbirth scene and brief mild language. Running time: 115 min. Opens Oct. 10.

Agnieszka Holland's films ("Europa, Europa," "The Secret Garden") typically tell a story in which she attempts to make beauty of gloom, but in the end it's a failing fight of light against darkness. This time out, Holland—aided by debut scripter Carol Doyle—adapts the novella by Henry James previously reworked by William Wyler in 1949's "The Heiress." Though the new version is unlikely to bring actress Jennifer Jason Leigh (who again mistakes tics for depth) the Oscar that the Wyler film brought Olivia de Havilland, the story of Catherine Sloper—whose birth cost her mother her life, marking her unforgivably in the eyes of her wealthy father (Albert Finney)—seems tailor-made for Holland.

From the first scene, she has a lock on her theme: the mother dead on a bloody bed, the father refusing to hold the child, the infant in her crib with an incredible expression on her tiny face—a melding of lostness, devastation and dread—that virtually tells the movie in an instant. The rest is details. Those details include Catherine's growth into a woman devoted to her unyieldingly disappointed father, and her affection for a poor man ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs'" Ben Chaplin) who insists he wishes to marry her for herself and not her father's money, and which as the film's major subplot functions sufficiently but not artfully. Yet, well through the movie, when her father says to Catherine, "How obscene—that your mother should give her life so you can inhabit space on this earth," the film shows it's not moved past the point captured with the infant in the crib. Yet, having cut to the bone of one daughter/father relationship, "Washington Square" is a movie that makes a virtue of the reflexive property.—Kim Williamson

SUICIDE KINGS ★★★

Starring Christopher Walken, Denis Leary, Henry Thomas, Sean Patrick Flanery, Jay Mohr and Johnny Galecki. Directed by Peter O'Fallon. Written by Wayne Rice and Gina Goldman. Produced by Wayne Rice and Morrie Eisenman. A Live release. Thriller. Rated R for strong violence and language, and for some nudity and drug use. Running time: 107 min.

In this darkly comic thriller, five boys, in a desperate attempt to save one of their sisters from a gruesome fate at the hands of kidnappers, abduct former mob boss Charles Barrett (Christopher Walken) in the hopes that he can use his connections to free the girl. This rash gamble puts their own lives in danger, because, as the enraged Barrett points out, just as he could save the girl with one phone call, he could order a quintuple hit with equal ease.

The scheme is more than a little farfetched, and the boys don't adequately convey a sense of worry for the kidnapped girl that one would expect from people going to so much trouble and such peril to save her. This slackens the tension, but interest in the story is revivified with an intriguing plot twist. Also enlivening the proceedings is Walken, who is excellent as usual in portraying the darkly intimidating yet principled and wryly humored ex-crimelord. There's some sloppiness and confusion in piecing the elements together, and the story would have benefited from a closer examination of the protagonists and their motivations.—Christine James

YEAR OF THE HORSE ★★1/2

Directed and written by Jim Jarmusch. Produced by L.A. Johnson. An October Films release. Documentary. Not yet rated. Running time: 108 min. Opens Oct.

Although those who've become ardent fans of Neil Young and Crazy Horse through their many albums since "Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere" in 1969 on through 1996's "Broken Arrow" might well love this documentary that primarily records (onto Super-8 and 16mm) the band's 1996 tour of America and Europe, moviegoers only modestly or less enamored of such ditties as "Cinnamon Girl" and "Like a Hurricane" could find this something of a sit. Aiming to make a movie that's "100 percent Crazy Horse," Jim Jarmusch ("Dead Man") ends down in two digits.

He shows great affection for Young and his band offstage and onstage; performances of songs blessedly run full-length, with little commentary via camera cuts. (The visuals of a now 50-something Young attired in shorts and dark socks onstage, looking like an aged Macintosh dweeb, provides its own message.) It's the behind-the-scenes sections in which the film disappoints. Capturing a unique moment in time, "Woodstock" and "Monterey Pop" had a built-in electricity; "Year of the Horse" needs deep insight into Young's creative drive and into the personalities of his bandmates to have equal impact. But moviegoers will leave the theatre knowing virtually nothing more about Crazy Horse and Young than when they went in; the most interesting dialogue is provided by an on-camera appearance by Jarmusch himself. Although the addition of footage of 1976 and 1986 tours (filmed by Bernard Shakey) adds some nice grace notes, "Year of the Horse" is a pleasant but uncompelling historical curio.—Kim Williamson

SEATTLE

THE OTHER SIDE OF SUNDAY ★★★

Starring Marie Theisen, Bjorn Sundquist and Hildegun Riise. Directed by Berit Nesheim. Written by Berit Nesheim and Lasse Glomm. Produced by Nrk Drama. A First Look release. Drama. Norwegian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 104 min.

If there is one binding element to all of Scandinavian cinema, it is a relentless obsession with religious angst. From Carl Dreyer to Ingmar Bergman to Bille August to Lars Von Trier, Nordic filmmakers have so thoroughly plumbed the subject over the decades that it's hard to imagine anyone bringing something new to the tableau. And yet Norwegian filmmaker Berit Nesheim has done just that in her Oscar-nominated "The Other Side of Sunday."

Set in a small Norwegian village in 1959, Nesheim's film is essentially a coming-of-age tale, told through the eyes of a restless 16-year-old girl named Maria (Marie Theisen). As the day of her confirmation draws near, Maria begins to question many of the fundamental tenets of her faith, even as she grows curious about village boys, makeup, jewelry and American rock-'n'-roll.

Adapted by Nesheim and Lasse Glomm from Reidun Nortvedt's novel "Sunday," "The Other Side of Sunday" is a warm, affectionate tale of young womanhood staged by an exceedingly sensitive director. Considerable credit also goes to a uniformly outstanding cast; in particular, young Theisen carries the film magnificently on her shoulders, her radiant face displaying a torrent of adolescent emotions.—Wade Major

LOVED ★★

Starring Robin Wright-Penn, William Hurt and Amy Madigan. Directed and written by Erin Dignam. Produced by Philippe Caland and Sean Penn. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Rated PG-13 for intense thematic elements, brief disturbing images, language and nudity. Running time: 103 min.

Abusive relationships are an entertainment staple. TV movies of the week, bigscreen dramas and afternoon talk shows explore and exploit the horrible subject of men beating the women they supposedly love. With "Loved," writer/director Erin Dignam works hard to make her take on the topic avoid such well-worn paths in favor of a high-minded road seeking food for thought rather than outright entertainment.

"Loved" centers on Hedda ("She's So Lovely's" Robin Wright-Penn) and her iron-clad devotion to an ex-boyfriend who scarred her. He stands accused of the death of a later girlfriend, and prosecuting attorney K.D. (William Hurt) persuades Hedda to testify at her beloved's trial. Rather than point blame, Hedda tells the court that their violent incidents weren't his fault and why she sometimes "wasn't worth hitting." K.D. and Hedda's family try to comprehend her justification of abuse. It's a frustrating experience for all, including the audience.

Dignam starts "Loved" with a wallop—the death in question—and proceeds to unravel the mental forces responsible for the action. But "Loved" soon becomes a victim of its success. By trading immediacy for temporal and emotional distance, Dignam soon exhausts the audience curiosity she had deftly constructed; frustration gives way to apathy. Wright-Penn and renowned monotone Hurt perfectly inhabit their languid roles but, as Dignam intends, "Loved" provokes thought, not the audience.—Ian Hodder

SECRETS OF THE HEART ★★★1/2

Starring Andoni Erburu, Carmelo Gomez, Maria Charo Lopez and Silvia Munt. Directed and written by Montxo Armendariz. Produced by Imanol Uribe and Andres Santana. A Sogepaq production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 108 min.

Eight-year-old Javi (Andoni Erburu) and his older brother Juan (Alvaro Nagore) live with their spinster aunts (Maria Charo Lopez and Vicky Pena) in provincial Spain of the early 1960s. The mischievous Juan tells Javi that the dead whisper secrets left unspoken in life; Javi is easily persuaded, and he becomes fixated on the room where his father died, always kept locked by his mother. When the brothers return on school holiday to the house where their mother, uncle and grandfather live, Javi uncovers the secrets surrounding his father's death.

Films rarely explore the world from a child's viewpoint believably. There are innate limitations; inevitably, it's an adult's clouded memory of childhood onscreen, and the reminiscence is only as good as the child actor set to the task. But Spain's "Secrets of the Heart" is a charming film that succeeds both as a coming-of-age drama and as an authentic portrayal of a child's view of the world's mysteries.—Greg Lee

STILL BREATHING ★1/2

Starring Brendan Fraser and Joanna Going. Directed and written by James F. Robinson. Produced by James F. Robinson and Marshall Persinger. An October Films release. Romance. Not yet rated. Running time: 109 min.

Rest assured, lonely hearts: A perfect romantic partner does indeed exist. What's hard is finding that mate. Take the case of young Fletcher ("George of the Jungle's" Brendan Fraser), a Texas street performer, and Roz ("Little City's" Joanna Going), a gold digger from Los Angeles. Despite their differences, the duo make a love connection thanks to Fletcher's psychic ability and a case of mistaken identity. It's a cruel irony, however, that the movie about their attraction fails to engage its audience.

Like an unwanted suitor, "Still Breathing" strives to make us like it. Director/writer James F. Robinson infuses the film with "Sleepless in Seattle"-style plot twists and tidbits of Hollywood mysticism a la "Forrest Gump." The problem isn't Robinson's corny script—which could succeed under better conditions—but rather the film's lifeless direction and, most of all, fatal choice of stars. As Fletcher, a puppeteer with psychic abilities and a passion for collages and stone sculptures, Fraser is more doofus than artist. (Incredibly, Fraser won best actor kudos at the Seattle fest.) As Roz, Going has the conniving bitch role down, but she never exhibits any interest in their love affair. If this is a date movie, it's one for couples on the wane.—Ian Hodder

NOT LOVE, JUST FRENZY ★★1/2

Starring Nancho Novo and Cayetana Guillen Cuervo. Directed and written by Alfonso Albacete, Miguel Bardem and David Menkes. Produced by Fernando Colomo and Beatriz de la Gandara. A Mainstream production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy/drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 103 min.

"Frenzy" certainly describes the driving force behind the graphic, drug-fueled "Not Love, Just Frenzy." It's a comedy, a drama and raunchy erotica held together by a thin murder storyline. Despite the plot concerns, the movie barrels along at such a fast, techno-pounding pace that it's hard not to get caught up in the spectacle.

Not for the faint of heart, "Not Love, Just Frenzy" is set against the backdrop of the Madrid disco scene, where slightly shocking people do even more shocking things to and against each other. The action revolves around a gigolo framed of a sex crime by a psycho cop, the rent-boy's ex-lover and her slutty roommates. Various fluids are exchanged among the characters, but as graphic and disturbing as it can be "Not Love, Just Frenzy" is an entertaining jaunt through Madrid after dark.—Greg Lee

Starring Varla Jean Merman, Rossy de Palma and Francesca Leon. Directed and written by Kelley Sane. Produced by Pietro Cuevas and Mark Downie. No stateside distributor set. Musical comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 101 min.

Camp - humor = tortured audience: This simple formula is the undoing of "Franchesca Page," an unfunny comedy that attempts and fails to parody the world of musicals and theatre. In it, an overbearing, dramatic stage mom/performance artist named Rita Page persuades her untalented daughter Franchesca to audition for a part in a local theatre production. Though Franchesca botches her performance, a sleazy, bondage-geared producer named Veronica hires her anyway. As cast members are mysteriously murdered, Franchesca, Rita, her neighbor Melba and the show's star must join forces to stop the killer and save the production.

Interspersed throughout the melodrama are song-and-dance numbers that are supposed to satirize the overly cheerful and frequently ridiculous nature of musicals, but the humor is annoyingly obvious. The catty screenplay by Kelley Sane, who also directs, is the biggest flaw; yet, because the actors are doing their best to deliver dead sentences with sass, it comes off as nagging. Still, costumes, sets and makeup are nothing less than inspired.—Lea Russo

THE ISLAND ON BIRD STREET ★★

Starring Patrick Bergin, Jordan Kiziuk, Jack Warden and Michael Byrne. Directed by Soren Kragh-Jacobsen. Written by John Goldsmith and Tony Grisoni. Produced by Rudy Cohen and Tivi Magnusson. A Gallery Motion Pictures production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Danish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 107 min.

Hope is good. Being homeless is bad. Some people are good. Nazis are bad. Life on the street is especially disagreeable when you're a 12-year-old Jewish kid in Nazi-occupied Poland who is ever so certain that Poppa will come back for him. Denmark's "The Island on Bird Street" is an earnest film that hopes to get all of the above across to the moviegoer in a gritty, touching narrative but, as hard as it tries to convince the viewer that it is A Story That Must Be Told, further consideration yields a less poignant conclusion: No, It Didn't.

Based on the partly autobiographical novel by Polish/Jewish author Uri Orlev, "The Island on Bird Street" succeeds more as an action flick than a drama. Director Soren Kragh-Jacobsen elicits a good performance from Jordan Kiziuk, but the boy has an annoying Oliver Twist quality about him that soon grates. And it's a feeling of coerced sentimentality that emerges most strongly from this film.—Greg Lee

HARD CORE LOGO ★★★1/2

Starring Hugh Dillon, Callum Keith Rennie and Bernie Coulson. Directed by Bruce McDonald. Written by Noel S. Baker. Produced by Christine Haebler and Brian Dennis. A First Run release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 92 min.

The first films in Bruce McDonald's unofficial road trilogy ("Roadkill" and "Highway 61") were joyfully innocent and inspired pop-culture sprees that radiated high-octane energy. McDonald's new movie has some of the same drive as those, but the innocence is long gone.

"Hard Core Logo" is a mockumentary about a disbanded punk music group of that name from Vancouver. Its members decide to overcome their personal differences and exit retirement to play a benefit concert for an aging mentor, but they discover that they can never really go home. "Hard Core Logo" is harsh analysis of rock celebrity, but it's also McDonald's wistful examination of what the pleasures of moviemaking mean to him.—Kevin Courrier

GUY ★★★1/2

Starring Vincent D'Onofrio, Hope Davis and Kimber Riddle. Directed by Michael Lindsay-Hogg. Written by Kirby Dick. Produced by Vincent D'Onofrio and Renee Missel. A Polygram production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 89 min.

With last year's "The Whole Wide World," character actor and indie stalwart Vincent D'Onofrio showed he had a knack for producing even as he carried a lead role; "Guy" is no different. D'Onofrio plays an everyman who finds himself under the unrelenting gaze of a woman and her camera. The woman ("The Myth of Fingerprints'" Hope Davis) spies Guy in downtown Los Angeles and begins making a documentary about his life—without his permission. Taken aback by this intrusion into his life, Guy responds sequentially with bewilderment, anger, resignation and ardor.

Scripter Kirby Dick's controversial documentary "Sick: The Life and Death of Bob Flanagan, Supermasochist" received a special recognition award at the Sundance fest this year for its unflinching look at painful subject matter. His teaming with helmer Michael Lindsay-Hogg has crafted a startling look at our spectator society, wrought by expert watchers.—Greg Lee

FESTIVAL REVIEWS

CARLA'S SONG ★★★

Starring Robert Carlyle, Oyanka Cabezas and Scott Glenn. Directed by Ken Loach. Written by Paul Loverty. Produced by Sally Hibbin. No stateside distributor set. Drama. English- and Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 127 min.

As he did in his award-winning "Land and Freedom," director Ken Loach continues to explore the intersection of passion and politics. This time, the focus is not the Spanish Civil War but current-day Scotland and Nicaragua. After an encounter in Glasgow, romance blooms between local bus driver George (Robert Carlyle) and Carla (Oyanka Cabezas), a Nicaraguan emigre.

Beautiful but despondent, Carla conceals a painful secret that can be unearthed only when the lovers travel to her homeland. There, George meets a disaffected ex-CIA operative (Scott Glenn) who lectures him on atrocities wrought by the American government. So defamatory is Glenn's speech, in fact, that it has been blamed for the film's failure to find stateside distribution.

Loach has fashioned a moving, rhapsodic love story that's also part political thriller, part psychodrama. As he showed in "Priest," "Trainspotting" and "The Full Monty," Carlyle is an actor of astonishing range and depth. Cabezas and Glenn are not so fortunate; she's too internalized, he's not quite credible.—Lael Loewenstein

THE MAKER ★★1/2

Starring Matthew Modine, Mary-Louise Parker and Jonathan Rhys-Myers. Directed by Tim Hunter. Written by Rand Ravich. Produced by Andrew Lazar and Demitri Samaha. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 98 min.

An eerily menacing performance by Matthew Modine is a key virtue of this uneven drama by Tim Hunter ("River's Edge"). Modine plays Walter, long-lost older brother of Josh Minell ("Michael Collins'" Jonathan Rhys-Myers). Appearing on Josh's 18th birthday, Walter invites his little brother on a "business trip"—for grand theft and assault. Frightened yet intrigued, Josh must decide whether to follow him into a life of crime, not merely as a player but as "the maker": the one who makes the rules.

The film boasts a host of noteworthy performances: Fairuza Balk ("The Craft") sparkles as Josh's lesbian best friend Bella; Michael Madsen ("Species") is deliciously dark as a criminal underlord, and Mary-Louise Parker ("The Portrait of a Lady") suggests her role as a policewoman is fuller than the writing would allow. That the script is so inconsistent is one of the film's shortcomings; much of the dialogue is witty and surprisingly original, but the story feels unstructured and amateurish. Too often, Hunter resorts to shoot-'em-up action sequences when he should be spending time developing characters.—Lael Loewenstein

WAKE UP, LOVE ★★★1/2

Starring Dario Grandinetti, Soledad Silveyra and Juan Leyrado. Directed and written by Eliseo Subiela. Produced by Jorge Rocco and Damian Kirzna. No distributor set. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Run time: 98 min.

A gem of a film that could shine with careful specialized distribution, "Wake Up, Love" is delightful Argentine filmmaking. Set in modern-day Buenos Aires, the story follows a group of middle-aged friends who decide to track down their old friends, stage a 25-year reunion and rekindle memories of their youth. Not quite "Romy and Michelle's High School Reunion," "Wake Up, Love" is at once more touching, more ribald, more romantic and more profound.

In the central role of Ricardo—also known as Elvis—Juan Leyrado does an impressive turn. Gray of hair but still green of spirit, Ricardo keeps in shape by dancing daily to "Jailhouse Rock." But Ana (Soledad Silveyra), his wife of 24 years, is depressed and menopausal. Ricardo decides to throw a party, inviting Ana's old flame Ernesto (Dario Grandinetti) in the hope that she might regain some of her luster. Having jilted Ana two decades earlier to pursue a political career in post-revolutionary Cuba, Ernesto has never quite forgiven himself. In renewing their friendships, Ernesto, Ana and Ricardo discover aspects of each other they had long forgotten or never known.

Cleverly, writer/director Eliseo Subiela intercuts present and past, showing how little has really changed. One teasing flashback involves a condom purchase; several others show the youths at high school dances decorated in surreal-looking neon pinks and yellows. To his credit, Subiela doesn't take the story in a predictable direction. Just when it seems Ernesto and Ana might reunite, he falls for a young Cuban cellist who seduces him with her music.

FESTS

Indeed, music is an important element in "Wake Up, Love": Both the haunting strains of Bach sonatas and the hip-swiveling beats of Elvis will resonate long after the film ends.—Lael Loewenstein

PIZZICATA ★★★

Starring Cosimo Cinieri, Fabio Frascaro and Chiara Torelli. Directed and written by Edoardo Winspeare. Produced by Edoardo Winspeare, Dieter Horres and Jean-Jacques Varret. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Italian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 93 min.

This lyrical and delicate pastoral romance tells a story of forbidden love in Southern Italy, circa 1943. When the plane of an Italian-American fighter pilot (Fabio Frascaro) crashes on an elderly widower's property, his daughter Cosima (Chiara Torelli) falls for the youth. Her desire poses a considerable dilemma, as she is promised to another. In the strict Catholic community, the would-be lovers can express their affection only by dancing the ritualistic Pizzica, a suggestive interplay in which the man and woman's bodies never touch.

"Pizzicata" has an earnest simplicity that comes through in its performances, production design and cinematography. With the cast's thick Salentino accents and austere garments and the aged-looking sepia film stock, the movie seems almost to have come from another era. It lacks a satisfactory resolution—some plotlines are abandoned outright—but it's an absorbing and carefully rendered tale.—Lael Loewenstein

A MOMENT OF INNOCENCE ★★

Starring Ali Bakhshi, Mirhadi Tayebi and Mohsen Makhmalbaf. Directed and written by Mohsen Makhmalbaf. Produced by Abofazl Alagheband. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Farsi-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 78 min.

In this autobiographical story, Iranian filmmaker Mohsen Makhmalbaf revisits his youth—with a twist. Some 20 years earlier, then-teenager Makhmalbaf stabbed a young policeman to demonstrate his opposition to the Shah's regime. After a prison stint, he became a filmmaker. An open casting call for one of his movies prompts a strange coincidence: Among the auditioners is the policeman Makhmalbaf attacked. Inspired to restage the event onscreen, Makhmalbaf hires the ex-cop as a consultant and casts two eager young men to play the combatants.

Initially, the film's tone is unclear, but when the policeman objects to the casting choice (he wants a better-looking actor to play himself) it veers into absurdist comedy. A clever script, surprisingly, doesn't lose its wit in the translation, though it seems overlong. Makhmalbaf uses different camera angles, slow motion and sound, presumably to show the prismatic patterns of memory. Some of these stylistic devices work; more often they feel whimsical and lack motivation.—Lael Loewenstein

GODZILLA, KING OF THE MONSTERS

[The filmmaking duo behind "Stargate" and "Independence Day" are now turning their attention to one of the most famous monsters of all (see our "Godzilla" article in this issue), with the result set to open on U.S. screens May 20, 1998. Here's what BOXOFFICE had to say about the Embassy-Toho release that started it all.]

Combining most of the frightening features of "King Kong" and the more recent "Creature" and "Monster" pictures, this Japanese-made horror melodrama is a natural for sensational exploitation and should attract the hordes of film fans who delight in pictures that will make them shudder. It is ideal for action houses. Raymond Burr, the only Hollywood actor in the cast, narrates and appears in a few scenes that are obviously added to the original. The Japanese players in the story either speak English or their voices are dubbed into English. A Toho production by Tomoyuki Tanaka, "Gojira" (as it was titled during its 1954 Japanese run) was directed by Terry Morse and Ishiro Honda, and the original story is based on an old Japanese legend about a mammoth creature 50 stories high that has been awakened from a prehistoric past beneath the sea (here, by H-Bomb explosions). Utterly fantastic, of course, the special photographic effects of this 400-foot creature emerging from the sea to stalk on land and crush the tall buildings of Tokyo should elicit gasps or shrieks from youngsters or from the more susceptible women patrons—even though they really love it. Momoko Kochi is a pretty heroine, and the other Japanese actors are adequate. Takashi Shimura, Akira Takarada, Akihiko Hirata and Sachio Sakai co-star.

EXPLOITIPS:

With Raymond Burr, featured villain in "Rear Window" and dozens of other Hollywood films, as the only familiar player, this picture must be sold on its sensational angles. Use cutouts of Godzilla or papier-mache reproductions of this monster to attract the horror fans. Compare it to "King Kong," "The Creature From Beneath the Sea" and other famed film monsters.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE GOLDS ★★

Starring Jennifer Beals, Brendan Fraser, Faye Dunaway and Garry Marshall. Directed by Ross Marks. Written by Jonathan Tolins and Seth Bass. Produced by Paul Colichman, John Davimos and Mark Harris. A CFP release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 93 min. Opens 10/24.

Based on a play and initially aired on cable TV, "The Twilight of the Golds" strives for more controversy and concerns than it achieves. The trick-question premise, which explores the concept of a family's confrontation with the possibility that the next addition to their genetic circle is likely to be born gay, remains throughout a conceit around which the actors act up. Every now and then the surface is pierced, but in the main the impact resonates only on the scale of interesting dilemma, never delivering the weight a confrontation with the issues of genetic testing should carry.

The cast tries hard to bring complexity to stock characters, but ultimately without the writing to sustain their choices those who choose bold strokes fare best for themselves, if not for the film as a whole. As the potential grandparents, Faye Dunaway and Garry Marshall (who is also the executive producer) are nothing if not lively and attention grabbing. Jennifer Beals ("Devil in a Blue Dress"), as their pregnant daughter, and Brendan Fraser ("George of the Jungle"), as their gay son, don't really have room to be fully formed.—Bridget Byrne

THE PEACEMAKER ★★★1/2

Starring George Clooney and Nicole Kidman. Directed by Mimi Leder. Written by Michael Schiffer. Produced by Walter Parkes and Branko Lustig. A DreamWorks release. Action. Not yet rated. Running time: 122 min.

DreamWorks SKG, the studio led by Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen, makes itself proud with a successful launch with "The Peacemaker." Although the action genre has recently seemed to be played out, the producers here—longtime Amblin-eers Walter Parkes and Branko Lustig—made a decision that pays off in spades onscreen: They tapped a woman for the director's chair. Although TV director Mimi Leder ("ER") likewise is making her theatrical debut, it's an assured one. From the opening sequence—a train ride through Russian countryside (with all aboard not knowing they are doomed), shot with a seriousness of purpose and attention to humanity that recalls David Lean's effort on "Dr. Zhivago"—"The Peacemaker" places itself outside the orbit of actioners more interested in smirky jokes and calisthenic explosions.

Still, this is an action film, so the plotline—a no-nonsense U.S. intelligence operative ("Batman & Robin's" George Clooney) and the new head of the White House's nuclear anti-smuggling group ("The Portrait of a Woman's" Nicole Kidman) go on a mission to retrieve stolen warheads—is effectively intense, if nothing earthshaking. A careful choice of malefactors—a Bosnian diplomat (Romanian actor Marcel Iures) who wants to make Americans suffer the wages of war for which he feels they bear some responsibility—is part and parcel of the filmmakers' serious approach, but in the end it's unnecessary, given the genre's limitations, which hardly make for "Before the Rain" territory.—Kim Williamson

THE EDGE ★★★

Starring Anthony Hopkins and Alec Baldwin. Directed by Lee Tamahori. Written by David Mamet. Produced by Art Linson. A Fox release. Drama. Rated R for language and some adventure gore/violence. Running time: 118 min.

What would happen if David Mamet, he of the plays and movies ("Glengarry Glen Ross") most widely known for their violence of language and cojones characterizations, tried to write a standard Hollywood movie? The result, apparently, would be a standard Hollywood movie with a difference. "The Edge," more of a drama than the action/thriller it's being billed as, exhibits a restrained literateness that's quite effective.

Mamet blends two narrative conventions—man vs. man, and man vs. nature—in this story of two men whose plane crashes in the Alaskan wilderness. One, an older billionaire (Anthony Hopkins), has a beautiful model (Elle Macpherson) for a wife and a memory that never forgets information he comes across in his virtually nonstop reading; the other is a handsome fashion photographer (Alec Baldwin) who might or might not desire the rich man's wealth and woman.

Hopkins as the bookworm (the project's early title) and Baldwin as the man who would be king are excellent. Director Lee Tamahori (finding a "Once Were Warriors" level of success after his "Mulholland Falls" misstep) pays assured attention to the minutiae of character.—Kim Williamson

EAVE IT TO BEAVER ★★1/2

Starring Christopher McDonald, Jane Turner and Cameron Finley. Directed Andy Cadiff. Written by Brian Levant nd Lon Diamond. Produced by Robert monds. A Universal release. Comedy. ated G. Running time: 87 min.

Baby boomers who grew up with TV's ost beloved family, the Cleavers, will be little disappointed by this modern-day m, which models itself after the popular 950s TV series "Leave It to Beaver." oday's children, however, will probably njoy it for comedy's sake.

The premise for the film is that many of e vignettes created in the '50s TV series ill still be funny today—with an updated ist of characters and cool contemporary ngo. Although the storyline by screenriter Briant Levant (who directed epiodes of TV's 1983-88 "The New Leave It Beaver") and Lon Diamond seeks to reserve the integrity of the original, copies f an original never quite measure up to the al thing. As Ward Cleaver, Christopher IcDonald ("A Smile Like Yours") proides a role closely resembling that popurized by the late Hugh Beaumont, and rik von Detten as the Beaver's brother is perfect Wally. As mom June Cleaver, owever, Janine Turner ("Cliffhanger") akes certain liberties with her role, and 'ameron Finley ("What's Eating Gilbert irape") as the Beaver fails to emote much ersonality or screen appeal.—Pat Kramer

MONEY TALKS ★★

Starring Charlie Sheen and Chris ucker. Directed by Brett Ratner. Written y Joel Cohen, Alec Sokolow and Vince McKuen. Produced by Walter Coblenz. A New Line release. Action/comedy. Rated R or graphic violence and pervasive strong anguage. Running time: 92 min.

Because a struggling investigative journalist, James ("The Arrival's" Charlie Sheen), needs a major story to save his career, he sets up a smartaleck motor-mouth ticket scalper, Franklin ("The Fifth Element's" Chris Tucker). While Franklin s being transported to jail, an elaborate prisoner break results in casualties, and Franklin gets blamed. Now he needs James' elp to clear his name; he agrees, in exchange for an exclusive story. It all sounds ike a fair trade—until they're chased and hot at and James is accused of murder.

In "Money Talks," Sheen and Tucker ock horns in various scenarios that set the wheels in motion for an onslaught of comic acial slurs and humorous stereotypical situations. Making his directing debut, Brett Ratner attempts (if not successfully) to assemble an interracial action/comic duo worthy of comparison to Snipes & Harrelson, Murphy & Nolte or Gibson & Glover.

His usual onscreen self, Sheen holds his own, if barely; the manic Tucker steals the show. His comedic timing is the real element holding the film together. When he opens his mouth, it's like a pinata bursting after being hit, sending out a barrage of colorful comic treats.—Dwayne E. Leslie

MASTERMINDS ★★1/2

Starring Vincent Kartheiser, Patrick Stewart and Brenda Fricker. Directed by Roger Christian. Written by Floyd Byars, Alex Siskin and Chris Black. Produced by Floyd Byars and Robert Dudelson. A Triumph release. Action/comedy. Rated PG-13 for violence included in a children hostage situation, and for language. Running time: 105 min.

"This is a 'Die Hard' situation," exclaims 14-year-old Ozzie ("Alaska's" Vincent Kartheiser) when he finds himself trapped in an affluent private school that's been commandeered by a sophisticated security system expert gone bad ("Star Trek: First Contact's" Patrick Stewart) and his army. The plot: to extort a ransom for each child from their wealthy parents. But not if Ozzie can help it. A charming genius with a proclivity for troublemaking, Ozzie sets about mucking up the carefully crafted plan.

Wanting to be the "Die Hard" for the teenage set, "Masterminds" unfortunately does not nearly measure up to the film to which it admits its debt. The charismatic hero and villain keep the momentum going but, given "Masterminds'" plural title, more direct conflict of an ascendingly ingenious caliber was needed between nemesis and hero, rather than the fairly routine manner in which our young rogue dispatches of the goons.—Christine James

FREE WILLY 3: THE RESCUE ★★★

Starring Jason James Richter, August Schellenberg, Annie Corley and Vincent Berry. Directed by Sam Pillsbury. Written by John Mattson. Produced by Jennie Lew Tugend. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated PG for thematic elements involving whale hunting, and for brief mild language. Running time: 86 min.

Jason James Richter and August Schellenberg reprise their roles as adopted son Jesse and father Randolph for this third installment in the Willy orca saga. This time out, a 10 percent decline in the local killer-whale population has two possible explanations: Either there is a natural cause, or a black-market price of $200 per pound of orca meat has drawn poachers.

Willy, freed in installment #1 and returned home for #2, in this episode (as its title implies) must be rescued. (What's next: "In Search of ..."?) The heart of the story actually is a subplot: A little boy named Max (Vincent Berry) for the first time sees what his father (Patrick Kilpatrick) does for a living—kill animals. Max becomes torn between accepting his dad's chosen way of life and doing what he feels is right.

This anti orca-killing movie has excellent up-close underwater photography, and new animatronic whale replicas created by Walt Conti's team at Edge Innovations are even more convincing than before. In addressing controversial animal-rights matters, "Free Willy 3: The Rescue" succeeds in giving audiences an environmental jolt, but some moviegoers might remain cool to a secondary message, that it's okay to risk your job by breaking rules.—Dwayne E. Leslie

EVENT HORIZON ★1/2

Starring Laurence Fishburne, Sam Neill, Kathleen Quinlan and Joely Richardson. Directed by Paul Anderson. Written by Philip Eisner. Produced by Lawrence Gordon and Lloyd Levin. A Paramount release. SF/horror. Rated R for strong violence and gore, language and some nudity. Running time: 96 min.

The Event Horizon is a deep-space research vessel sent in the year 2040 to explore the boundaries of the solar system, only to disappear without a trace. Seven years later, a distress call is received from the missing ship, which has suddenly reemerged near Neptune. A team is sent to rescue any survivors and salvage the vessel—but what they don't know is that the craft now carries an unseen alien entity that is pure evil. Unfortunately, the scariest thing about this sci-fi/horror film will be its abysmal boxoffice receipts after word of mouth makes this film a non-"Event."

An uncompelling cast makes up the unsympathetic team of misfits who seem not at all qualified for the mission. Laurence Fishburne as the crew leader is somnambulistic even at moments of crisis. The plot's twists and turns are derivative of horror schlock fare that even cable's campy "Tales From the Crypt" would be embarrassed to use. Scripter Philip Eisner begins with a premise overflowing with potential but does not follow through, and his blood-and-gore scare tactics are more yawn-inducing than pulse-racing.—Christine James

Starring Mel Gibson, Julia Roberts and Patrick Stewart. Directed by Richard Donner. Written by Brian Helgeland. Produced by Joel Silver and Richard Donner. A Warner release. Suspense/thriller. Rated R for some violence. Running time: 135 min.

As a cab driver who believes in numerous conspiracy theories, from covert black helicopters to earthquake weapons in space to the real reason why the government puts fluoride in the water, Jerry Fletcher (Mel Gibson) seems to be just another eccentric element of New York's urban landscape. His one real (if reluctant) confidante is Alice Sutton (Julia Roberts), an employee of the Justice Department who has some of her own ghosts to haunt her. Alice listens out of compassion but doesn't believe a word of his stories. Yet, when he publishes his hypotheses, he finds his life endangered by people he's inadvertently exposed.

Gibson is admirably up to the task of portraying the complexly layered character of Jerry, who is alternately tragic, hilarious, ingenious and heroic. Roberts is both strong and sympathetic as her character wrestles with conflicting emotions and instincts. As malevolent Dr. Jonas, Patrick Stewart exudes pure cold evil. But several backstory elements could have been explained more clearly, and a more fully elucidated exposition of the truth would have increased the narrative's implications and thereby its tension. Still, "Conspiracy Theory" is fast-paced and exciting.—Christine James

AIR BUD ★★★

Starring Kevin Zegers. Directed by Charles Martin Smith. Written by Paul Tamasy and Aaron Mendelsohn. Produced by Robert Vince and William Vince. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG for brief mild language. Running time: 98 min.

"Air Bud's" Buddy the dog never slam-dunks or twirls a basketball on his paw—although he can hit a shot from the free-throw line. And that attention to realism is to the good. Still, if "Air Bud" were more about that lovable golden retriever instead about his new owner Josh (Kevin Zegers), a boy who must come to grips (somewhat predictably) with a new life in a new town, the film could have been a family classic. Yet children will fall in love with Buddy, and a slow-starting narrative eventually concludes on a high note.—Dwayne E. Leslie

MARVIN THE MARTIAN IN THE 3RD DIMENSION ★★1/2

Directed by Douglas McCarthy. Written by Keith Baxter, Timothy Cahill, Charles Carney, Mark Eades, Ryan Harmon, Kathleen Helppie-Shipley, Douglas McCarthy, Julie McNally and Chris Otsuki. Produced by Kathleen Helppie-Shipley and Mark Eades. A Warner Bros. release. Animation. Unrated. Running time: 13 min.

Now playing on Manhattan's Fifth Avenue is a fight to the death between two giants. Look, up in the sky—not a bird, not a plane, not even Godzilla vs. Megatron, but two new multi-story flagship studio stores, located but a block apart. There are few better commodities than fond childhood memories; on Fifth, Disney and Warner are clashing and cashing-in on them in deluxe style. The Mouse House has been at this for generations, but the Wabbit is coming up fast, and one of his secret weapons is the premiere animated presentation of "Marvin the Martian in the 3rd Dimension," in an open-ended engagement in the eighth-floor screening room at the Warner Bros. Studio Store. Purists might still scoff, but this establishment's elaborate environment, along with many of the items for sale, perfectly captures some of that old Looney Tune spirit. And, really, it's okay; Bugs never pretended to be anything but the ultimate conman-on-the-make anyway. Several tall sculptural murals (including one that serves as a marquee for the short film), clever sight gags, displays, videowalls, and interactive ACME thingamabobs provide suitable atmosphere. The store also boasts a restaurant, an animation art gallery and a glass elevator with shifting views of snooty Van Cleef & Arpels across the Avenue. Patrons can have a fine time without buying anything.

Unfortunately, that idiosyncratic Merrie Melody mix of attitude and mayhem is doing better on the glassware than on the silver screen. To wit, then: the fillum. The store is currently the only North American venue for Marvin's 70mm 3-D experience, sponsored by Toshiba. (The CGI short can also be seen at Warner's Movie World park in Germany and opens this Christmas at the Movie World in Australia.) Admission to the 13-minute show is $2; along with receiving a ticket and a cardboard pair of polarized glasses, moviegoers get a pleasantly hefty Marvin the Martian souvenir coin (which one can keep or use for a $2 discount off most store merchandise). The program runs continuously at 20-minute intervals, and while waiting to enter the 74-seat theatre ticketholders stand in a stylish, retro-yet-futuristic lobby and are entertained by the classic Chuck Jones cartoon "Duck Dodgers in the 24 1/2 Century" on several large monitors. But that is the structure's one fatal flaw. The new Marvin the Martian movie, for all its computer-generoted and multi-dimensional wonders, can't live up to its predecessor, and it suffers all the more mightily when placed in such proximity.

Upon reinspection, "Duck Dodgers" proves to be comprised of a series of blackout vignettes built on jokes that were corny four decades ago. But the result is a knowing lunacy that's endlessly entertaining, because the gags are enacted by an ensemble of broadly drawn yet subtly shaded characters with superb comic timing. In "MM 3-D," as with the recent full-length "Space Jam," it seems the current custodians of Warner's classic characters don't fully understand them.

In the 3-D effort, Daffy stutters and spritzes as megalomaniacally as ever but, without Bugs (or "Duck Dodgers'" Porky) along as a knowing foil, the humor is undercut by more than half. Marvin is still intent an universal domination, but the comic fundamentals of that creature from another world (who was so deeply touched by Porky's "birthday" gift of a beribboned bomb in "Duck Dodgers") are nowhere to be found here. Daffy's periodic outburst, "Duck Dodgers in the 24th and one-half century!" was self-aggrandizement as satire; here, when he sputters, "Duck Dodgers in the 3rd dimension!" it's just a shill for something we've already paid for. The (mostly recycled) gags are bigger and shinier, but not as deft.

"Marvin the Martian in the 3rd Dimension" is one long, loud, sometimes luscious, unrelieved chase sequence. It could have been a beaut, a real humdinger, but it's ultimately just another soulless thrill ride a la "Twister." Or, to put it another way, it's a derivative sitdown break from a good shopping experience. In this wisenheimer empire that wasn't built on a claying mouse, that is dessshpicable.—Alex Albanese

NEVER ALONE ★★★1/2

Starring Scott Cervine and Mark McKeel. Directed and written by Scott Cervine. Produced by R. Harold Smith and Mark Kirby. A Bindu Films release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 83 min.

Described as "a modern-day quest for meaning, inner peace and the perfect cup of coffee," "Never Alone" is the type of film that leaves a strong impression behind while entertaining and enlightening its audience, as much in what it does say as in what it doesn't. As the first feature film produced by Bindu Films partners R. Harold Smith and Scott Cervine, "Never Alone" is a richly funny black comedy with a sense of depth, light and hope that goes beyond the scope of most commercially produced films.

Presented as a pseudo-documentary, it is the story of independent filmmaker Sam Kelley (Scott Cervine) who, in a sudden, tragic twist of fate, loses his beloved wife Ellie (Leah Leddy) to a hit-and-run driver. Wrought by despair and searching for meaning in life, he begins to experience "otherworldly" contact. Despite a barebones approach, "Never Alone" is an exciting film for those who aspire to a higher consciousness—or just want to laugh a lot.—Pat Kramer

STAG ★

Starring Mario Van Peebles, Andrew McCarthy and Kevin Dillon. Directed by Gavin Wilding. Written by Evan Taylor and Pat Bermell. Produced by John Dunning and Mike Pasoernak. A CFP/Avalanche release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 93 min.

Ten men come together inside a big, empty house for a bachelor party. Party favors include drugs, liquor, two strippers and their handler. After an accident kills one of the girls, the men desperately try to escape the consequences, creating a situation that's irredeemably worse. This group of very good actors led by Mario Van Peebles (and also including Ben Gazarra, Gerald Anthony and John Stockwell) creates energy, but the script by Evan Taylor and Pat Bermell focuses on character degeneration and fails to create interest.—Karen Achenbach

SLEEPY HEADS (no stars)

Starring Eugene Nomura and Sayuri Higuchi Emerson. Directed and written by Yoshifumi Hosoya. Produced by Yuko Yoshikawa. A Phaedra release. Comedy. Japanese-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 87 min.

Remorselessly strained and unfunny, "Sleepy Heads" (an apt description of the experience) tries to be a perceptive cultural assimilation comedy; the result is virtually unwatchable. The seriocomic travails of three young Japanese immigrants trying to survive in New York City becomes a poor man's "Trouble With Harry" when one of their friends dies of a drug overdose and they attempt to dispose of the body.

Nothing in Yoshifumi Kosoya's writing and directing shows even slight comic or romantic sense. With its inept acting, flat characterizations, misfired humor, idiotic farce and narrative pointlessness, "Sleepy Heads" is as tiring as they come.—Dale Winogura

THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE: THE NEXT GENERATION ★★

Starring Renee Zellweger and Matthew McConaughey. Directed and written by Kim Henkel. Produced by Robert J. Kuhn and Kim Henkel. A CFP/Avalanche release. Horror. Unrated. Running time: 87 min.

It's prom night in a small Texas town. Four teens cruise in a car, bickering with a "next generation" modernity; it's a wonderful sequence. Only later, as they blithely walk into horror after horror, do audiences realize these "modern" teens have never been to the movies.

Although sometimes funny at the film's expense, much of this 1994 production contains clever humor built through snappy dialogue and the creation of incongruent characters. Even so, its current main attraction will be its stars—native Texans Renee Zellweger and Matthew McConaughey, in their second film and in their second film together (both debuted in "Dazed and Confused").—Karen Achenbach

BUTCH CAMP ★★

Starring Judy Tenuta and Paul Denniston. Directed and written by Alessandro de Gaetano. Produced by Timothy E. Sabo and Steven Gellman. A Billingsgate release. Comedy. Unrated. Running time: 101 min.

Michael J. Fox lookalike Paul Denniston plays Matthew Grabowski, a sensitive gay man beset by a multitude of problems, including having a delightfully better vocabulary than anyone else in the film. He enrolls in a Butch Camp, humorously commanded by Judy Tenuta, in order to develop the skills to deal with "hetero oppressors" and all other difficulties.

"Butch Camp" is wildly uneven in tone. Its target audience could find it very funny, but others will find it hard to overlook poor production values, ragged interweaving of plot elements, and underdeveloped characters.—Karen Achenbach

RATCHET ★

Starring Tom Gilroy and Margaret Welsh. Directed and written by John Johnson. Produced by George Belshaw and John Johnson. A Phaedra release. Suspense. Unrated. Running time: 112 min.

A nasty, muddled film noir, inspired by Jim Thompson and the Coen brothers, "Ratchet" tells the story of a hack Tinseltown screenwriter traveling to Nantucket to work on a script, where he gets into a senseless mess of murder, blackmail and police coverups.

Tepid suspense, wan mystery and hopelessly convoluted plotting in John Johnson's script are rendered even more vacuous by his murky, gimmicky direction, and verbose dialogue and ambling pace don't convey a sense of danger.—Dale Winogura

HAPPINESS IS IN THE FIELD ★★

Starring Michel Serrault and Carmen Maura. Directed and written by Etienne Chatiliez. An Artificial Eye release. Comedy. Unrated. Run time: 107 min.

It used to be that French filmmaker Etienne Chatiliez offered up movies, like "Life Is a Long Quiet River" and "Tatie Danielle," that were cynical and caustic, a breath of fresh air among the sticky French comedies of his peers. With his latest film, he's gone soft, to the detriment of his story and the audience's enjoyment.

Michel Serrault plays a toilet-seat manufacturer beset by strikers at work and a wife and daughter who hold him in contempt at home. When he sees a TV show about a lookalike who left his family years before, never to return, he decides to pose as that man in order to escape his oppressive lot.

It's a good idea for a film, but Chatiliez doesn't take it anywhere. Everyone gets what he or she wants, blunting the edge.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

NATIONAL NEWS

LATE SUMMER B.O. HEATWAVE

The touch-and-go summer of 1997 came back unexpectedly strongly in late July and August, rescuing early summer results that were the worst in five years and pushing domestic boxoffice past the $4 billion plateau two weeks earlier than during record-setting 1996.

The strong showings by mid-to-late summer titles like "Face/Off," "Men in Black," "George of the Jungle" and "Air Force One" seemed to draw into question the studio practice of front-loading the summer with supposedly "can't miss" sequels and formula films. With the notable and predictable exception of "The Lost World: Jurassic Park," sequel after sequel underperformed, from the disastrous "Speed 2: Cruise Control" (gross: less than $50 million) to the mediocre "Batman and Robin," the least successful film to date in Warner's franchise, and a title which had to struggle to top the $100 million mark.

Then there were the films that weren't sequels but which felt like they were: "Hercules" and "Con Air" (aka "The Rock 2"). Though a better film than its immediate animated Disney predecessors, "Hercules" was struggling to get near the $100 million mark at press time, with the possibility existing that it would be the film that finally broke the blockbuster boxoffice streak Disney animation has been on since "Beauty and the Beast." A two-part theory about why "Hercules" didn't show much boxoffice strength: with Disney releasing at least one major animated title per year and saturation reached in the children's video market, it's more and more difficult to make a Disney animation project seem so "new" it has to be seen in a theatre. At the same time, mainstream titles that might have been released with an R-rating five years ago are making themselves more and more family friendly: Just as the PG-13 rated "Independence Day" siphoned off "Hunchback's" audience in 1996, "Men in Black" (also PG-13) undermined "Hercules" in '97.

What audiences seemed to be craving in '97 were movies with quirky ideas that re-invigorated old formulas or created new ones. When those films arrived, moviegoers found their way back to America's moviehouses. Here's hoping studio decision-makers were paying attention, and that the lessons of summer '97 are now lessons learned.

NEW LINE CREDIT LINE: $400 MIL.

The long wrangle over the future of New Line Cinema appears to have ended. The target of much speculation over ownership in the aftermath of Time Warner's buyout of parent company Turner Broadcasting, the company, which had been on the block as recently as the first quarter of 1997, has secured $400 million in new production financing and will operate as an autonomous division under the Time Warner umbrella.

The announcement marked the end of a volatile year for New Line, which had its worst performance ever in fiscal '96, thanks to expensive flops like "The Long Kiss Goodnight" and "Island of Dr. Moreau." The $400 million, raised from a coalition of international banks, will give New Line the funding to produce and release films with a wide range of budgets through the end of fiscal 1999.

The new monies would be used for annual slates according to the following formula: four to five pictures a year in the $40-plus million range; eight pictures a year in the $20 to $40 million range; and four to five titles per year made for under $20 million. Unspecified production and acquisitions requirements relative to Fine Line, New Line's specialty "art-house" arm, would also be met.

New Line's boxoffice slump, meanwhile, appeared to turn the corner this summer. The sleeper successes of "Austin Powers" and "Spawn" have helped contribute to a sense within the Hollywood community that New Line is once again emerging as a force to be reckoned with.

UNCIVIL MASS. ACTION

MPAA president Jack Valenti assailed a bill recently passed by the Massachusetts legislature which would make it illegal to use the name, portrait, picture, voice or any part of an individual's life story without first securing written permission.

The bill was introduced as part of an effort to block the filming of a controversial Touchstone feature entitled "A Civil Action," based on author Jonathan Harr's 1995 book of the same name. "A Civil Action," which is to star John Travolta, tells the true story of a crusading lawyer in Woburn, Mass. who risked his career by filing a toxic waste dumping lawsuit against Beatrice Foods and W.R. Grace company, two of the largest companies in Massachusetts. The original civil suit alleged that a group of families had lost children to leukemia thanks to unsafe toxic waste handling by the companies named. Ironically, the new bill was introduced on behalf of eight of those families seeking compensation for their role in Harr's retelling of the story.

Valenti lashed out at the bill. "Under [this proposal], every name and picture utilized in a single issue of [any] publication would have to be cleared by the individual described," Valenti said. "The ramifications are endless and hostile to the rights of reporters and creators of all media."

In a late development, acting Mass. governor Paul Cellucci said he intended to veto the bill if it reached his desk on grounds that it represented a disincentive for film companies doing business in Massachusetts. Touchstone's "A Civil Action" is set to begin filming Oct. 1 in Toronto and Boston.

CINEMANIA WEB UNPLUGGED?

Cinemania, one of the most popular movie-related websites on the internet and an offshoot of a highly successful Microsoft CD-ROM research tool, may or may not be "disappeared" from the internet.

The possible move, which caught many observers by surprise, was yet another indication of the difficulties even major companies like Microsoft are having making heavy investment in the internet pay off. More than half Cinemania's staff was let go, with remaining writers and staffers possibly to be reassigned within Microsoft, many to "Sidewalk," another Microsoft internet publication.

DREAMWORKS' MOMENT OF TRUTH

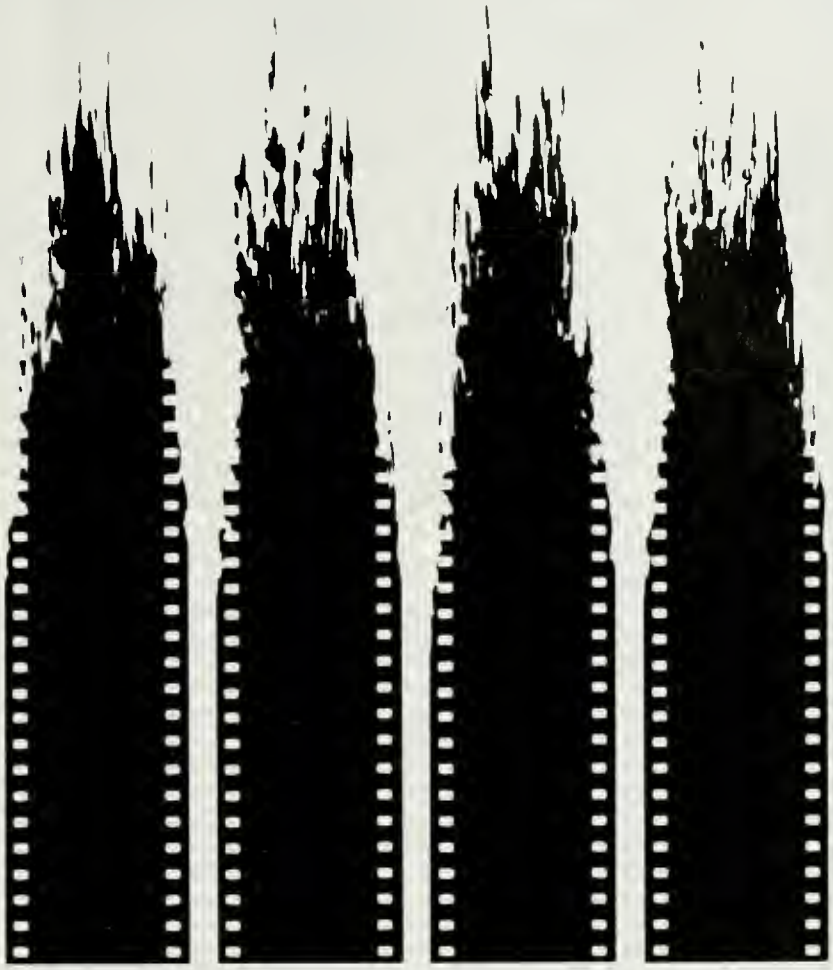
After much speculation that the planned DreamWorks studio site in Playa Vista, Calif. might be abandoned thanks to environmental lawsuits and financial troubles at development company Maguire Partners, rumors were circulating that a viable new ownership agreement was in the offing.

The DreamWorks facility had been in doubt thanks to its status as an "anchor" for a larger development which has been in bankruptcy since mid-summer, though the investment banks involved had, at press time, not yet foreclosed. DreamWorks, meanwhile, was still housing 1,420 employees in a variety of buildings throughout the Los Angeles area, and had looked at alternative sites, including one in Glendale, Calif. adjacent to DreamWorks' animation facility, scheduled for completion in December, 1997.

A string of recent court decisions fortifying DreamWorks building plans as environmentally sound were also contributing factors in the upbeat mood surrounding the Playa Vista development. DreamWorks spokespersons were optimistic but cautious, pointing out that financing for the larger development and DreamWorks' decision to ultimately build there were separate issues. An L.A. city official called DreamWorks' stance a tactic to gain leverage in future negotiations.

MIRAMAX WIELDING AX

Staffing volatility at specialty powerhouse Miramax Films continues to rage unchecked, thanks to "growing pains" within the mega-successful company and talent raids by other distributors seeking to break down Miramax's lock on the specialty market.



Recent executive departures included John Logigian and Scott Greenstein, Miramax' former exec. vp of business and legal affairs and its senior vp of publishing, music and new media, respectively. Business and legal affairs have subsequently been reorganized under the direction of exec. vp of business and legal affairs Neil Sacker.

To assist Sacker, Miramax has promoted vp of business and legal affairs Vicki Cherkas to the level of senior vp—the highest ranking post below Sacker. Andrew Herwitz and Steven Hutensky have also been promoted to senior vps of business and legal affairs.

Replacing Sacker in L.A. is Cary Meadows, vp of business and legal affairs.

In other Miramax news, the company notched a major achievement when "Cop-Land," a gritty ensemble film starring Sylvester Stallone and Robert De Niro, racked up Miramax's best opening weekend ever, pulling in an estimated $13 million over the weekend of August 15. Miramax's previous record holder, "Pulp Fiction," grabbed a $9.3 million opening in the much less competitive fall season back in October of 1994.

The achievement was all the more impressive given Stallone's unimpressive recent boxoffice track record, plus the strong hold-over competition from "Air Force One" and "Conspiracy Theory" which "Cop Land" had to face down.

EXHIBITION BRIEFINGS

UATC MAY GO UP FOR SALE

United Artists Theatre Circuit has announced that it has retained Merrill Lynch & Co. to assist the chain in "investing strategic alternatives with respect to its ownership and capital structure," according to a prepared statement issued by the company. Alternatives being weighed include the possible sale of the privately held stock of UATC's parent company, OSCAR I Corp. Says UATC chief operating officer Kurt Hall, "The restructuring of the group's ownership and/or capital structure has always been part of the company's medium-term plan...this process is being accelerated as a result of the improved operating performance of the company combined with the very favorable financial markets." He added that although the ownership and capital structure may change, "it is not expected to have any effect on the company's day-to-day operations, or its recently announced development plans." UATC's recent restructuring cut corporate expenses by 25 percent for a $10 million annual savings; additionally, the chain has sold many of its international properties and will sell 70 underperforming domestic theatres with a total of 280 screens. The revenue from these sales will help fund UATC's investment of $175 million to build 450 new screens and renovate existing theatres in key markets, including New York, Philadelphia and San Francisco. UATC is the second-largest chain in North America with 2,300 screens.

ACT III ON THE BLOCK?

Act III, the 10th-largest exhibitor in the nation with 673 screens, will likely be put up for sale by former television producer Norman Lear, who owns 68 percent of the company. Act III, which is being valued at $550 million, is expected to generate much interest from U.S. exhibitors, foreign exhibitors or financial investors. Act III's 122 sites are located in the Pacific Northwest, Texas and Nevada.

NAC ELECTS OFFICERS

At its annual membership meeting in Anaheim, Calif., the National Association of Concessionaires elected new officers and directors to the NAC board. Norman Chesler of Theatre Candy Distributing was elected for a two-year term as president of the board of directors. Chesler has previously served in many positions for the NAC, including director, treasurer, regional vice president, vice president and, most recently, president elect. David Scoco of Creative Concession Concepts has moved from NAC president to chairman of the board. Skip Stefansen of Metropolitan Concessions Inc. goes from treasurer to president elect, and R. Evan Gordon Jr. of Gordon Consulting has moved from a director at large to treasurer. Newly elected directors include Maria Angles of Cinemark USA Inc., Francine Greco of Odeum Sports Expo, and Carmen Torzon of Service America Corp. as directors at large; Wally Helton of CinAmerica as regional vice president, Pacific Southwest; Ron Krueger II of Wehrenberg Theatres as regional vice president, Mountain Central; and Sheila Parisien of Calgary Flames Hockey as regional vice president, Western Canada. Bill Rector, former chairman of the board, joins the NAC's council of past presidents.

WIRED WORLD EXTRA: SPECIAL FORMAT NEWS

IWERKS, SHOWSCAN MERGE

Iwerks Entertainment and Showscan Entertainment have announced that they have signed a definitive agreement to merge, thereby becoming the world's largest provider of ride simulators and software, with a combined 160 sites and a library of 68 ride simulation titles. As well as expanding its motion simulator business, the merged company plans to increase its presence in the giant-screen market.

IMAX SETS SALES RECORD

Orders from Knoxville, Tenn.'s Regal Cinemas; Newport Beach, Calif.'s Edwards Theatre Circuit Inc.; Redondo Beach, Calif.'s Krikorian Premiere Theatres; Halifax, Nova Scotia's Empire Theatres; and Marcus Corp. of Milwaukee, Wis., have helped Toronto-based Imax Corp. achieve record sales in 1997. Regal and Edwards both inked agreements for 10 Imax 3-D systems, marking the largest signings in the history of Imax; Krikorian and Empire ordered one each; and Marcus will install two. These 24 sales, all of which were made within just over a month, nearly equal Imax's total 1996 sales of 29 systems.

In a related item, Imax has announced an ambitious film release schedule, with plans to have five new titles on screens before the end of 1998 and 20 additional projects in development. Imax will release its 3-D version of "The Nutcracker" in November.

DICKINSON GETS O.K. FOR OK SITE

Dickinson Theatres has received approval from the Bixby, Okla. city council to build a 64,000-square-foot entertainment center with a 3,200-seat, 20-screen theatre. The cinema, scheduled to open in May 1998, will offer advance ticketing sales at a futuristic boxoffice; all three digital sound systems; stadium seating with high-back rocker chairs and upholstered cupholder armrests; spacious legroom; and wall-to-wall screens. Dickinson operates 211 theatres in Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma.

REGAL BUILDS

In addition to its numerous recent acquisitions, including Cobb Theatres, Magic Cinemas, Krikorian Premiere Theatres and Georgia State Theatres, Regal is adding dozens of new screens to its kingdom. The most recently announced include a 16-plex in Antioch, Calif.; a 20-plex in Dublin, Calif.; a 16-plex in Oceanside, Calif.; an 18-plex in Columbus, Ohio; a 22-plex in Dayton, Ohio; a 22-plex in Atlanta, Ga.; an 18-plex in North Brunswick, N.J.; a 14-plex in Vineland, N.J.; and a 22-plex in Charlotte, N.C.

Regal will also be building a 16-plex and FunScape entertainment center in Wilmington, Del. The circuit most recently opened a 16-plex in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.; a 14-plex in Bel Air, Md.; and a 12-plex in Virginia Beach, Va.

AMC, MBK IN CO

MBK Real Estate Ltd. announced it has commenced construction on two 24-screen AMC theatre complexes in the Denver metro area. The Westminster Promenade and the Highlands Ranch sites will feature the most advanced sight, sound and comfort features, including stadium seating, generous row spacing, love seats, SDDS sound, and wall-to-wall screens. Says MBK president Richard P. Kraus, "These projects are not only the finest of their kind, but both are in locations that define the center of growth in their respective areas."

GCC'S NEW LANDMARK

General Cinema Theatres will open a 16-screen, 80,000-square-foot megaplex at Landmark Center, a 950,000-square-foot office/retail project in Boston. The theatre will feature wall-to-wall screens, digital and THX sound, stadium seating and love seats. A wide variety of concession products will be offered, including Unos pizza and soft pretzels, and a sit-down cafe will have Starbucks coffee and gourmet pastries. To speed customer service, the concession stand will employ a unique three-tiered design developed by General Cinema, a self-serve option, and state-of-the-art computer cash registers that use touch-screen technology so theatre staff can process transactions more quickly. The Landmark Theatre is part of General Cinema's $250 million growth plan to add over 300 new screens to its circuit by 1999.

CLEARVIEW BEACONS TO PATRONS

Clearview Cinemas has opened its 17th location in the Metro New York area, the Beacon Hill 5 in downtown Summit. The five-plex has state-of-the-art digital sound, high-back and rocker seating with cupholder armrests, computerized ticketing and concession stand terminals, and a courtesy phone. Also scheduled to open soon are Clearview's Chester 6 and Bayonne Cinema 10. Clearview mixes first-run commercial and art movies, and its core audience is comprised of both sophisticated moviegoers and families with young children.

CONSOLIDATED EXPANDS IN OAHU

Pacific Theatres subsidiary Consolidated Theatres will build a state-of-the-art eight-plex in the Koko Marina Shopping Center in Oahu, Hawaii, and will add five screens to the nearby Pearlridge West Theatre, expanding it to 21 screens. All new screens will feature the latest technologies and amenities, including DTS, SDDS and Dolby Digital sound systems; stadium seating; love seats; and wall-to-wall screens.

MARCUS MOVES TO OHIO

Marcus Theatres Corp., the largest theatre circuit in Wisconsin and the 19th largest in the country, broke ground July 17 in Pickerington, Ohio on the first of two 16-screen movie theatre complexes planned for the Columbus Metropolitan Area. The state-of-the-art theatre with its almost 3,000 seats is scheduled to open by Easter season 1998 at the southeast corner of the intersection of State Rts. 256 and 204. The site, at more than 18 acres, is large enough to accommodate additional screens in the future. The second Ohio site, being built on the north side of Columbus, will have well over 4,000 seats.

This Ohio expansion is part of Marcus Theatres' recently accelerated growth plan, which calls for 500 screens by the year 2000. Marcus Theatres, a division of the Milwaukee-based Marcus Corp., currently operates 297 screens in Wisconsin and Illinois. Bruce J. Olson, president of Marcus Theatres and vice president of Marcus Corp., says, "We're confident that moviegoers in metropolitan Columbus will be enthusiastic about our all-stadium-seating auditoriums and the many other exclusive amenities that we offer."

WILLMING REAMS POLICY TRAILER MAKES ITS 'MARK

Willming Reams Animation has completed the animated Cinemark USA Policy Trailer, which features digital stereo surround sound in DTS, SDDS and Dolby SR-D. In their recurring roles, animated characters Front Row Joe, Popcorn Penny, Elton and Clyde take a 3-D journey through the magic of the movies. The trailer combines cel animation with 3-D environments and feature singing and dancing to an original score, evoking the concept of a pre-feature animated short.

Q&A: WIRED WORLD EXTRA: DISNEY'S NEW VR GAME CENTERS

Disney's newest foray in the world of entertainment brings the Mouse House into the digital domain. DisneyQuest, a project three years in the works, will bring 20-30 virtual reality entertainment centers to various sites around the world, the first of which will open in summer 1998 in Florida's DisneyWorld. As DisneyQuest executive producer Joe DiNunzio tells* Boxoffice*, patrons will be able to ride a virtual motion-simulated roller coaster of their own design, take a trip to the Cretaceous Period on the Virtual Jungle Cruise, soar on Aladdin's magic carpet, and do virtual battle with Disney villains, all in the space of a few hundred thousand square feet and in the span of a few hours. With an electronic debit card required for entrance, the term E-Ticket Ride takes on a whole new meaning.

Boxoffice: Tell me about some of the new forms of entertainment that will be found at DisneyQuest.

JOE DINUNZIO: With DisneyQuest, we're taking some of our experience as entertainers in the theme park business and some of our experience as entertainers in the film business, and we're creating a fundamentally different kind of entertainment—an environment where guests can literally dictate the kind of experience they have using interactive technology.

Boxoffice: What's unique about the technology?

DINUNZIO: We started with an R&D project about three years ago called Aladdin's Magic Carpet Ride. Aladdin's Magic Carpet Ride was an attempt to understand whether we could put guests inside Aladdin's world and create an environment where they believed they were really there, they were really in the animated world of Aladdin, where they could interact with characters and have an experience as if they were flown into that world. What was magical about that for us was that that's a place that you can't otherwise go to. You can get on a plane and fly to Egypt and see the pyramids, but you can't get on a plane and fly anywhere to see [Aladdin's world], because it's only in our imagination and on celluloid. When we tried to do Aladdin's Magic Carpet Ride three years ago, there was no possible way for that to make economic sense. The technology wasn't there yet. Now it is. And now we've created an experience where you can get the sense of what it would be like to fly on a magic carpet, interact with Aladdin and Jasmine and all the characters from "Aladdin," and have an experience in this world that otherwise you could never possibly go to.

Boxoffice: To what degree can people interact?

DINUNZIO: We have an attraction called Virtual Jungle Cruise that pays homage to the great Jungle Cruise attraction at Disneyland. We said, "What would happen if you could actually steer the vehicle in Jungle Cruise?" And that led us to think, "What if you could go someplace that you couldn't actually go to? What if we could send you back in time?" And ultimately, we came up with the idea of, "Let's send people 60 million years back in time to when dinosaurs were still on earth." We put them in an environment where they can actually paddle a raft. Sitting in a real rubber raft, using real wooden paddles, based on how they paddle, they determine whether they go left or right down the stream, go down the rapids, go down the calm spot, look at the Tyrannosaurus rex, avoid getting eaten by a velociraptor. They basically have the ability to move anywhere in that environment.

Boxoffice: One attraction is described as hand-to-hand combat with Disney's most notorious villains. How else will DisneyQuest be incorporating movie characters?

DINUNZIO: We certainly with DisneyQuest plan on leveraging very aggressively our library of characters. Obviously, feature animation is an incredible source for us. As new characters and new stories come out, we will certainly look to find ways to create attractions that utilize those characters and stories. One of the great things about DisneyQuest is we can upgrade, change the software, bring new characters in, or slightly change the characters that are in there—we have a lot of opportunity to play with it. Part of the basic design of DisneyQuest is we will constantly evolve the product. Every four to five years, much if not most of DisneyQuest will have been changed out and will be in some way, shape or form refreshed.

Boxoffice: Are you charging individually per game or will there be an entrance fee?

DINUNZIO: The way we've structured it is there is ticketing outside of the facility, and guests will buy a debit card, and you'll have choices about how many credits you want to put on your card at the gate. In some ways it's a little bit like the old ticket books at Disneyland, with the A, B, C, D and E tickets, except it's electronic.

Boxoffice: How much is the average game?

DINUNZIO: We haven't made those determinations yet.

Boxoffice: Should exhibitors be worried that you're vying for the same entertainment dollar?

DINUNZIO: I sure don't think so. There is a broad opportunity in the entertainment business to provide great, engaging experiences for guests. My personal belief is that there are synergistic opportunities. For instance, I'm incredibly happy to know that there's an AMC theatre near our first site in DisneyWorld, because I think there's a [mutual benefit] in having cinemas near where we are. [At DisneyQuest's second site] in Chicago, we are diagonally across the street from a Cineplex Odeon. We love that. It's great. It's fantastic. In both locations we have announced, we're within yards of exhibitors. So we do not see that as competition—we see it as an opportunity for synergy.—Christine James

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

The Big Picture

Some ideas die because they're bad ideas, and some ideas die because they're too far ahead of their time. The conventional wisdom about what Francis Coppola and his American Zoetrope production arm tried to do back in the early 1980s is that Coppola had it all wrong. His dream of a state-of-the-art production entity operating outside traditional studio channels was hubristic to most observers—a byproduct of Coppola's unparalleled critical and commercial status in the aftermath of the first two "Godfather" movies, "The Conversation" and "Apocalypse Now."

Certainly Coppola was feeling his oats, and he had a right to. He had made his name as the finest of a young generation of American directors who were redefining the boundaries of content for American movies. He had received more Oscars (a total of five) by the age of 37 than almost any other creative personality in movie history. And he had done so without relinquishing his hold over the mass audience—the achievement the Hollywood powers-that-be usually respect the most.

But Coppola's dream had many facets. He wanted to make a home for young talent, where it wouldn't be exploited the way he felt he had been on his way up. He wanted to prove that there was a market for indigenous American movies characterized by serious themes which the public had come to associate with subtitling and a European distribution credit spliced to the front of a print. Hollywood was still editing most theatrical features using horse-and-buggy systems like the upright Moviola—a laborious process involving workprint, splices, and that most precious of movieland commodities: a great deal of time. Coppola wanted to take the next logical step and create an environment where the data storage capabilities of computers would make it possible for editing to be done completely in the digital realm—a commonplace today, a revolutionary idea back in 1982. Most of all, Coppola wanted to own his copyrights—in other words, to work in the movie medium the way artists in other media do, by retaining possession of the fruits of his intellectual labors.

Some of Coppola's ideas were idealistic, and his brief dream has been written off in the movie history books as a monumental mistake. He ran aground when he overspent and borrowed millions to complete "One From the Heart"—an actually quite charming romantic comedy, made in something resembling the style of the "magical realist" writers, crossed with the studio artifices of a classic musical from MGM. "One From the Heart" (which starred Terri Garr, pictured) has been somewhat unjustly dismissed as a complete debacle, mainly by people who haven't seen it, and largely because it broke what was never an exceptionally well-capitalized bank in the first place. Its $37 million production cost—a scandal in 1982—seems the soul of frugality as the $100 million studio budget becomes something like the norm today.

Though Coppola himself bore an enormous fiscal burden in the aftermath of the collapse of his ambitious Hollywood dream, and although it is one of the great tragedies of the past two decades that much of the time, one of our finest filmmakers has had to busy himself with projects that were often accepted on the basis of financial need, the dream itself seems overdue for a reassessment. The success of Miramax in the past decade proves, for example, what Coppola always proclaimed and was in part mocked for: that there is in fact a sizeable audience for American-made art films, capable of providing distributors with enormous grosses for interesting, out-of-the-mainstream fare. And the rhetoric of DreamWorks SKG—the desire to create a studio from the ground up, to find a home where a community of like-minded artists can flourish, to use state-of-the-art technologies to streamline the creation and distribution of films—all has a familiar ring to it for anyone who watched what Francis Coppola was up to some 15 years ago.

The great difference, though, is that Coppola was and remains a cinematic artist first and foremost, and an empire builder only secondarily. If his great, arduous, perhaps even noble attempt to refashion American moviemaking priorities to his own specifications was ultimately a failure, it was a failure of the noblest kind.

Coppola himself sensed this when he finally got around to making his last real "dream" project: the 1988 film "Tucker," in which an American automotive visionary tried to get a new car manufacturing company off the ground only to be beaten down by the power of the existing industrial system, coupled with his own rather outsized character flaws. There was a touch of self-pity to the analogy. Coppola can't really believe that the studios that had given him carte blanche for so long ganged up on him, the way the car companies did on the real Preston Tucker, or that shadowy forces were at work behind the scenes to foster what ultimately was the relatively explicable commercial failure of Zoetrope's studio. Still, it is interesting to note that, in making "Tucker," Coppola showed himself to be bloody but unbowed; of all the films he's made in its aftermath, it is visually and narratively most similar to the approach used in "One From the Heart."

The great good news is that Coppola has at last emerged from the near-bankrupcy into which the collapse of the Zoetrope studio complex pitched him, and that he is talking ambitiously about the future again. Though often dismissed and overlooked, his output of the last decade and a half has been almost always visually audacious, and often far more narratively complex than it has been given credit for. At 58, Coppola is still a relatively young man with many movies ahead of him. It should be fascinating to see where his restless, inventive spirit takes him—and maybe the whole movie medium—next.—Ray Greene

THE LONG, SLOW

Despite the fact that she was a political rather than a cinematic celebrity, the death of Princess Diana was a time of much soul-searching for those of us involved in even the business side of the entertainment press. Every journalist on the regular editorial staff of BOXOFFICE has had his or her brush with a world famous personality. Although it is official policy here that the personal lives of major film actors, directors, writers and producers are of interest in these pages not at all, we've all seen the looks on the faces of friends and loved ones when they've been informed of just who we spent the day having a conversation with, and perhaps we've even borrowed a bit of stardom's reflected glory, if for nothing else than to add a bit of anecdotal lustre to a cocktail conversation.

On one of my earliest assignments for BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE, I got my first up close and personal look at paparazzi photographers in action. Previously, I had always regarded tabloid "shooters" as members of a colorful if somewhat venomous profession—not the kind of people I'd personally choose to spend time with, but a fascinating phenomenon created out of a weird intersection between the public's insatiable interest in celebrity and the expansive safeguards granted to information gatherers under the U.S. Constitution.

Like most journalists, I fetishize the First Amendment, and while I recognized the sleaziness inherent in the paparazzi profession, I was at the time (and I remain) unwilling to impose restrictions on what to me is the most fundamental right Americans enjoy merely because I find aspects of the way that freedom is utilized personally distasteful. Since I had never spent time with freelance celebrity photographers, I had an uninformed perspective on their behavior. On the day five years ago when I found myself in their midst, I initially viewed them as being, if not exactly benign, than at least essentially harmless.

I discovered otherwise. The occasion was an awards event at which Tom Cruise was being given an important trophy. The dais was packed with people who were there to wish him well—friends, co-workers, celebrity acquaintances—and Cruise was his usual photogenic self. From where I was sitting, he was indistinct—a blur of white teeth, great hair and charisma, looking for all the world like a long-lost Kennedy.

The paparazzi were stationed directly in front of my table, in a severely restricted area that allowed them to grab a quick shot as each celebrity walked to the stage. Their pleading, first-name-basis entreaties for "just one more shot" were both monotonous and comical, and they seemed essentially helpless behind the stanchions that marked off their limited access. It would have been hard to imagine that somewhere among all those potbellies, flak jackets and Nikons slumbered anything resembling a dark side.

Halfway through lunch, a famous actress got up to go to the bathroom. She was inherently newsworthy to the tabloid press—beautiful, young, rumored to be more than a little troubled. A photographer broke ranks and started following her, and suddenly, all bets were off.

I will never forget the looks on those paparazzi faces as this poor woman made her way to the bathroom and back. It's been fashionable since Princess Diana's death to dehumanize whole segments of the entertainment press, and generalizations are usually inaccurate if not downright wrong. But "bestial" is the only word I can think of to accurately describe those faces as they clambered over each other, elbows flared, shoving and pulling and gouging each other out of the way as they tried for that one good shot.

I remember the wave of repulsion that swept over me. I remember how much I wanted to believe that what was going on had nothing to do with my profession. I remember asking myself: of what news value is a woman's decision to freshen her makeup or take a pee?

The worst came later. Cruise was in production on a major feature film, and couldn't arrange his schedule so that he could get away long enough to stay for the entire event. His award was given to him; he made a short, charming speech. Then his presenter made what should have been a forgivable mistake: He announced that Tom would be leaving momentarily, forgetting that there was essentially just one way out. From the direction of the regrouped photographers, I swear I felt them giving off heat.

They were on Cruise the minute he left the stage, of course—shouting, jockeying for position, pinning him in their flashes. Cruise stiffened perceptibly, but kept going until one particularly industrious shooter spotted the trophy in his hand and shouted, "Just one with the award, Tom!"

Courtesy got the better of Cruise, and he stopped and turned, smiling. In seconds, the photographers had encircled him completely, virtually trapping him against the wall he was standing in front of. He turned his face obligingly from one lens to the next; still they kept shooting. He made another circuit, offering every photographer a perfect angle. Still they kept shooting. A look of fear came into his eyes, and the hand holding the trophy started to shake. Still they kept shooting. And they began pressing in.

Watching from the sidelines, I was seized with an almost unbearable sense of vicarious claustrophobia. The situation was in the process of getting out of hand, but no one other than the immediate participants seemed to know it. I watched Cruise try to continue his original path toward the exit. The photographers closed in tighter, literally beating him back. Several of the faces in my field of vision were beginning to take on characteristics of gloating. Some of the photographers were beginning to recognize that they had one of the biggest stars in the world at their mercy, and you could tell they were enjoying the feeling.

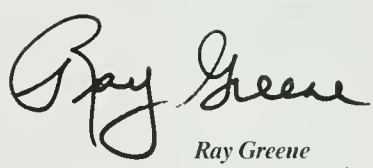
> "It's been fashionable since Princess Diana's death to dehumanize whole segments of the entertainment press, and generalizations are usually inaccurate. But 'bestial' is the only word I can think of to accurately describe those faces as they clambered over each other, elbows flared, shoving and pulling and gouging each other out of the way as they tried for that one good shot."

I was outraged, and I wasn't alone. Before I knew what I was doing, I was on my feet along with two other reporters at my table. Journalists aren't supposed to involve themselves in events; they are there merely to report on them, and anything else is deemed unethical. Ethics became secondary for me and two other writers that night, who felt soiled by what was being perpetrated right in front of our eyes, supposedly in the name of our profession.

We pushed our way into the mob, which seemed to half expect security of some sort to take action. A corridor of space opened up, and Tom Cruise moved through it at double speed. When the photographers figured out we were journalists like them and not "events staff" or bodyguards, they gave us dirty looks.

It felt good.

Years later, when I interviewed Tom Cruise for this magazine, I thought about the complexity of that moment. On the one hand, Cruise, like all media superstars, was in many ways a creation of publicity. Without promotion, without a certain willingness to use the magnetic attraction of his celebrity to focus attention on his creative pursuits, he would vanish overnight into the limbo of movie trivia games and "where are they now?"



But movies and the people who populate them are not state secrets. There is no Deep Throat waiting to provide government-shattering disclosures about "Jerry Maguire" or "Eyes Wide Shut." Entertainment journalists like to view themselves as hard-bitten cynics in part because so much of what they report on is handed to them by publicists or as staged events. Many envy the people they cover, and so they aggrandize their own occupations by pursuing their subjects with an almost vicious disregard for their humanity, figuring that the tougher their professional behavior, the more they can demonstrate (to themselves at least) that they're as vitally important as Woodward and Bernstein were back in 1973.

There are extenuating circumstances in the death of Princess Diana—a drunken driver who may or may not have shouted "catch me if you can;" a freewheeling boyfriend known as a man who loved to take risks; a car that may have been going as much as four to six times the speed limit as it skidded into a cement tunnel support somewhere along the Seine. But what lingers in the mind is the image of men with cameras descending on a spectacle of blood and wreckage and people dying before their eyes, and having the inhuman callousness to frame and compose 20 rolls worth of what, in the deepest sense, can only be called pornographic shots.

I was unsurprised that it was Tom Cruise who was the first celebrity to go public with his outrage via a phone interview on CNN conducted as doctors were still fighting for Diana's life. He had been chased in that very tunnel, and me? I had seen the look on his face five years ago, and come to realize that in a very real sense, he and those who share the public hazards of his occupation were being chased every minute of their lives.

So the next time you find yourself in a supermarket checkout line eyeballing surveillance camera images of the indiscretions of Frank Gifford and Kathie Lee; the next time you stop flipping channels to view "news" footage of murder and accident victims, of war casualties, plane crashes and homes ravaged by fire and flood, gunshots, bombs, bayonets, or a defective light on some unlucky family's Christmas tree, it might be a good thing, a humanizing thing, to ask yourself: Who are all those people caught in the momentary glare of all those dispassionate and cold-blooded cameras really running from? The paparazzi? Or you and me?

Until next time,

Ray Greene

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Oscar: Mann About Town? Destination center developer TrizecHahn is in negotiations with the Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences to permanently move the Academy Award ceremony to a site on Hollywood Boulevard. The proposed 3,300-seat venue would be located in the 500,000-square-foot entertainment center TrizecHahn is currently building next to Mann's Chinese Theatre (see BOXOFFICE, October 1997). The center, which will also house 14 new screens to be added to the Chinese, is part of a major revitalization of Hollywood and will be completed by the year 2000. The Academy Awards were first held in the Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel in 1929; for the last 30 years, the 3,200-seat Dorothy Chandler Pavilion and the 6,300-seat Shrine Auditorium have alternated as the ceremony's venue.

Grammy-winning composer Danny Elfman, who created unique ambient moods with his soundtracks for movies like "Batman," "Beetlejuice" and "Edward Scissorhands," has signed a multi-picture agreement with the Walt Disney Motion Picture Group. Under the deal, Elfman will make his debut as a filmmaker by directing, writing and producing movies on a first-look basis for the studio. Elfman, former frontman and founder of the band "Oingo Boingo," is currently composing the score for Disney's "Flubber."

'Fox'-y Lady: Drew Barrymore, star of Fox's "Cinderella," has inked a two-year, first-look production deal with the studio. Barrymore and production partner Nancy Juvonen will produce "Born to Shop" for Fox 2000 through their company Flower Films. Barrymore also plans to star as a girl who's a shopaholic. However, when she's suddenly killed by a bus, her disembodied spirit finds she must apply her proclivity for purchasing to 'shop' for new parents before she's reincarnated.

As part of Caravan Pictures' restructuring, Jonathan Glickman has been named president of the company, announced Roger Birnbaum, chairman and CEO of Caravan. Glickman, who has been with Caravan for four years, will oversee all aspects of development and production for the company. Projects Glickman has been involved with include "While You Were Sleeping" and "Grosse Pointe Blank." Caravan's most recent releases are "Rocket Man," "Washington Square" and "G.I. Jane"; coming up are "6 Days, 7 Nights," "Holy Man"; and "A Small Miracle," an adaptation of John Irving's novel "A Prayer for Owen Meany."

Actor George Clooney ("The Peacemaker") and producing partner Robert Lawrence, who recently signed a three-year, first-look deal with Warner Bros., have announced a slate of 12 pictures. Clooney and Lawrence, who have renamed their Left Bank Prods. Maysville Pictures, are reportedly focusing on "thinking man's character-driven action thrillers." Some of Maysville's upcoming projects include "Metal God," about a travelling salesman who moonlights as a singer for a heavy-metal band that solely covers Judas Priest tunes; "The Academy Group," about an elite team of investigators comprised of former military, law enforcement and government agents; "Move!," the true story of a choreographer who turned a group of delinquents into a dance troupe; "Zig Zag," which follows the exploits of a community of Gen X snowboarders; and "How to Build Your Own Country," in which a family tries to start its own nation after being ostracized by its neighbors.

Miramax Films has entered into a first-look co-production/distribution agreement with Los Angeles-based foreign sales and production company Nu Image. The two companies will co-produce up to four films annually, with Miramax distributing domestically and in all other English-speaking territories except South Africa. Nu Image was formerly allied with October Films, though most of the films under that arrangement were not released theatrically in North America.

MGM Pictures senior vice president of production Elisabeth Seldes has left her post to embark on a new career path as a feature producer for MGM and United Artists. Seldes joined MGM in 1993 as VP of production, moving up to senior vice president two years later. She oversaw such projects as "Moll Flanders" and "Mulholland Falls," and has been involved with "Day After Tomorrow," an action-thriller that's currently in development.

Carole J. McGorrian and Frank Salvino have joined production and international sales consortium Initial Entertainment Group as directors of production, announced IEG president Cindy Cowan. McGorrian previously held the position of director of production, finance at LIVE Entertainment; Salvino, also from LIVE, was director of post-production. IEG currently has three feature films in post-production: "Oliver Stone's Savior," an Oliver Stone/Janet Yang production starring Dennis Quaid and Nastassja Kinski; "Family Plan," starring Leslie Nielsen and Judge Reinhold; and "Montana," starring Kyra Sedgwick, Stanley Tucci, Robbie Coltrane and Robin Tunney.

The Smithsonian's National Air and Space Museum has opened its "Star Wars: The Magic of Myth" exhibition, which will run through October of 1998. The exhibition examines the impact of the film "Star Wars" on world culture. "Star Wars: The Magic of Myth" features more than 200 original props, models, costumes, characters and artwork used to create the three films in the trilogy: "Star Wars" (1977), "The Empire Strikes Back" (1980) and "Return of the Jedi" (1983). Included in the display will be Yoda, Darth Vader, Boba Fett, Jabba the Hutt and Han Solo frozen in carbonite, as well as production models of X-Wing spacecrafts, the Millennium Falcon, AT-AT Walkers, TIE Fighters, and an Imperial Star Destroyer. "Magic of Myth" sponsor Bantam Books will publish an illustrated companion book by Mary Henderson, who curated the exhibition.

HOLLYWOOD REPORT

MIRA SORVINO

In The "Money"

FATHER MERRIN

A New "Beginning"

DAVID SPADE

Heads "Kingdom"

"A CIVIL ACTION" In this drama that's based on a true story, a lawyer (John Travolta, "She's So Lovely") risks his career to represent eight families who have lost children to leukemia caused by exposure to toxic waste. Kathleen Quinlan ("Event Horizon") co-stars as the leader of the group who hires Travolta to sue the company that's responsible. Also starring are William H. Macy ("Fargo"), Tony Shalhoub ("Big Night"), Dan Hedaya ("Clueless") and James Gandolfini ("She's So Lovely"). Steve Zaillian, who wrote "Schindler's List" and directed "Searching For Bobby Fischer," scripts and helms. (Buena Vista)

"FREE MONEY" Mira Sorvino ("Mimic") plays an FBI agent investigating a murder at a prison run by a tough-as-nails warden ("The Island of Dr. Moreau's" Marlon Brando) in this black comedy. Charlie Sheen ("Money Talks") and Thomas Haden Church ("George of the Jungle") also star as two men who get the warden's 17-year-old identical twin daughters pregnant at the same time, resulting in all of them moving into the same house. (Distribution is to be set)

"P.S. I LOVE YOU" Rupert Everett ("My Best Friend's Wedding") will star in this comedy about a gay British Intelligence agent. Everett will also co-script with his writing partner, Mel Bordeaux. (TriStar)

"PARKER" This action thriller, based on "The Hunter" by Richard Stark, will re-unite Mel Gibson with "Conspiracy Theory" scribe Brian Helgeland ("Conspiracy Theory"), who wrote the adaptation and will make his directorial debut. Gibson will play the title character, a thief who is trying to track down his wife and former partner, both of whom betrayed him and ran off together. Maria Bello of TV's "ER" will play an old acquaintance who winds up helping Gibson's character. Also starring will be David Paymer ("Amistad") and James Coburn ("The Nutty Professor"). (Paramount)

"EXORCIST: THE BEGINNING" William Wisher, who co-wrote "Terminator 2" with James Cameron and recently adapted Michael Crichton's "Airframe," will scare up a script for a prequel to "The Exorcist," which will explore Father Merrin's first battle with Satan. Max von Sydow played Merrin in the original. (Warner)

"THE GOVERNESS" This romantic drama will star Minnie Driver ("Grosse Pointe Blank") as a young Jewish woman in the mid-1800s who takes a job on a remote Scottish island as a governess, and has a passionate affair with her employer. Sarah Curtis ("Mrs. Brown") will produce. (SPC)

"FROGS FOR SNAKES" Robbie Coltrane ("Nuns on the Run"), Barbara Hershey ("Portrait of a Lady"), Lisa Marie ("Mars Attacks!"), Debi Mazar ("She's So Lovely"), Ian Hart ("Michael Collins") and John Leguizamo ("Spawn") will star in this comic thriller about a gang of street thugs who are thespians at heart. (Distribution is to be set)

"KINGDOM OF THE SUN" David Spade ("Black Sheep") will voice the lead role(s) in Disney's next animated project, which will probably be released in the summer of 2000, following 1998's "Mulan" and 1999's "Tarzan." The plot is reportedly similar to that of "The Prince and the Pauper," in which two identical-looking boys from vastly different socio-economic classes inadvertently meet and decide to switch places. "Kingdom" will add an element of tension not found in "The Prince and the Pauper": a sorceress (voiced by Eartha Kitt) who threatens to turn one of the boys into a llama. Sting has signed on to compose songs. Roger Allers, who co-directed "The Lion King," will co-helm with Mark Dindal. (Buena Vista)

"A PERFECT MURDER" Loosely based on Alfred Hitchcock's "Dial M for Murder," this thriller about a man whose plan to kill his wife goes horribly awry will star Michael Douglas ("The Game") and Gwyneth Paltrow ("Sliding Doors") and will be directed by Andrew Davis ("Chain Reaction"). (Warner)

"A NIGHT AT THE ROXBURY" Another "Saturday Night Live" sketch brought to the bigscreen, "A Night At the Roxbury" will feature the amusingly obnoxious Roxbury Boys (Will Ferrell and Chris Kattan), who spend their lives club-hopping and trying desperately to convince girls to dance with them. Elisa Donovan ("Clueless") will play a supermodel who thinks the Roxbury Boys are rich and tries to bilk them out of their money. Amy Heckerling ("Clueless") helms and produces. (Paramount)

"DANCING AT LUGHNASA" Directed by Pat O'Connor ("Inventing the Abbotts"), this drama tells the story of five unmarried sisters and how their lives change when their brother, a Catholic priest who had been living in Africa, returns home. Meryl Steep ("Marvin's Room"), Catherine McCormack ("Braveheart"), Kathy Burke ("Nil By Mouth") and Sophie Thompson ("Emma") star. (SPC)

"RUNE" Dee Snider, former frontman of the heavy metal band Twister Sister, scripted this thriller and will star as a serial killer who uses the Internet to lure young girls. Kevin Gage ("G.I. Jane") will play a policeman who's also the father of one of the kidnapped girls. (Distribution is to be set)

"ENEMY OF THE STATE" Will Smith will star for director Tony Scott ("The Fan") as a charismatic Washington lawyer who's forced to go on the run when the National Security Agency frames him for a crime he didn't commit. Gene Hackman ("Absolute Power") is in talks to play a former NSA operative who helps Smith's character. (Buena Vista)

"54" Mike Myers ("Austin Powers: International Man Of Mystery") will take on a dramatic role as gadabout scenester Steve Rubell, who co-founded the infamous superstar-populated Manhattan nightclub Studio 54 in the '70s. Salma Hayek ("Fools Rush In"), Neve Campbell ("Scream"), Ryan Phillippe ("I Know What You Did Last Summer"), Sela Ward ("The Fugitive") and Heather Matarazzo ("Welcome to the Dollhouse") also star. Mark Christopher scripts and directs. (Miramax)

ET CETERA: Chevy Chase, Don Rickles and Jack Warden have joined Norm Macdonald in MGM's comedy "Dirty Work," about a man who starts a business exacting revenge for clients...Anjelica Huston has been cast as the wicked stepmother in Fox's "Cinderella," which stars Drew Barrymore in the title role. Dougray Scott ("Deep Impact") plays Prince Charming, and Melanie Lynsky ("Heavenly Creatures") is one of the two stepsisters...In Buena Vista's romantic comedy "I Won't Be Home For Christmas," Jonathan Taylor Thomas will play a high school senior who tries to prevent his girlfriend from falling for someone else. Arlene Sanford ("A Very Brady Sequel") directs.

TOMORROW

BOXOFFICE Goes Overseas and Undercover on the Set of "TOMORROW NEVER DIES" by Bridget Byrne

HERTFORDSHIRE, ENGLAND—James Bond flicks open a lady's Oriental fan. Knives fly from the struts of its painted semi-circle. Bond's eyebrow is raised barely a hairbreadth; only a slight moue flickers at the corner of his mouth as he responds with jaded amusement to this mini-secret weapon, another trick of the trade in the endless spy game that has engaged his life.

But this is not something Q has dreamed up—this is opposition gimmickry. And Bond is not on home turf; he's in a Vietnamese bicycle shop. Around him are rickshaws and tricycles; on the floor, in death or unconsciousness, lie a few coolie-clad bodies. The shop's facade has been ripped open to expose a whole cache of high-tech weaponry and a complex computer system, in front of which sits a beautiful woman, as insouciant as Bond himself.

It's a Tuesday morning in June at Eon Studios, Frogmore, Hertfordshire, just north of London, England. Bond, as embodied by Pierce Brosnan, and Michelle Yeoh, who plays Wai Lin, an agent of the Peoples External Security Force in Beijing, have been on the set since 8 a.m. to complete what callsheet No. 58 for the movie "Tomorrow Never Dies" refers to as "Int. Bicycle Shop." Prop requirements for the three scheduled scenes include "Bond's acquired gun, guns for thugs, handcuffs, concealed switch, Chinese 'Q' gadgets, ammo, chopsticks, computers, bicycles and Bond's new Walther PPK."

Already this morning, Wai Lin has fought thugs (hence the bodies on the ground). Now "confidences" are being exchanged between the beautiful Oriental spy and the British 007 agent (hence the look of understanding that passes between them as the fan explodes). Soon they will move on to a scene in front of the computer to track down a stealth boat. Together they are trying to put a stop to the evil machinations of a megalomanic media baron eager to start World War III.

As with most filmmaking, particularly anything that calls for special effects, this is all slow and tedious work, but it is accomplished by cast and crew with confident good humor and a strong sense of genuine camaraderie. The hidden wire is once again run up Brosnan's arm for another take on the exploding fan shot. Brosnan, wearing black slacks and a blue shirt, open enough to show the hair on his chest, is a gleaming presence, shiningly clean-cut through the haze of warm smoke enveloping the set. His impossibly good looks seem even more clearly delineated by the few more years under his belt and a little more heft to both his emotional and physical makeup than when he first stepped into the Bond role with "GoldenEye" in 1995. As he registers again Bond's unperturbed response to the killer fan, his eyes glint like blue steel.

"Confidence" is the word Brosnan chooses to describe both the quality that Bond must possess and the feeling he himself now has, playing this near classic role for the second time. His debut in "GoldenEye," which made him the fifth actor to play Ian Fleming's superhero (following Sean Connery, George Lazenby, Roger Moore and Timothy Dalton), was credited a success by both critics and the public, reviving interest in the character and extending the life of the Bond series begun by producers Albert R. (Cubby) Broccoli and Harry Saltzman in 1962.

As Brosnan is able to step out of the scene for a moment while camera adjustments are made, he acknowledges that it is indeed "a slow day" and uses a British schoolboy reference to describe the long shooting schedule, which has just passed the "half-term" mark. Location filming includes the French Pyrenees, Southeast Asia, Mexico and the Florida coast, but "home base" is this special studio in Frogmore, where three soundstages and adjacent facilities have been constructed (under a metal roof once used for supermarket storage) and a backlot has been transformed into a Saigon street on which a pivotal chase sequence takes place.

Second-unit shooting is also taking place nearby. The English papers, from the tabloids to The Times, feature articles this morning about a fire brigade being called to a shopping center parking lot in nearby Brent Cross the previous afternoon when a stunt involving burning cars got a little too hot to handle and black smoke necessitated evacuation. But, throughout the day on the "Bicycle Shop" set, explosions—which include an ornamental dragon belching flame and the back of a tricycle blowing off—work without mishap.

Re-wired, Brosnan stands relaxed while the camera crew make last-minute adjustments before covering themselves with protective blankets prior to the fan exploding in their direction. He's so relaxed he actually yawns, but when "action" is called the Irish-born star snaps skillfully into motion, movement and dialogue handled together with the professional grace he has demonstrated since his TV days as "Remington Steele."

> "I've signed everything: breasts, buttocks... My signature has got bigger and bolder and more open. I don't know what that means. Confidence, maybe!"

Meanwhile, co-star Yeoh has time to chat, something she does with consummate ease. "It's as though this role was written for me," says the beautiful action star, explaining that Wai Lin is "a woman of the '90s." Born in Ipoh, Malaysia, and schooled and trained in ballet in England, this former Miss Malaysia has performed her own stunts in starring roles in many Asian action films, the best known to international audiences probably being "Police Story III: Supercop" with Jackie Chan. "I always wanted to be Bond," she admits with a laugh, happy that she has landed a role that is the next best thing. She dubs Brosnan as Bond, James Bond, to be "perfect, just perfect."

Although clearly quite decorative enough to meet the sexy, gorgeous standard necessary for traditional Bond girls, this slender, sophisticated actress is something way beyond that, naturally able to meet the demands of a role that calls for a woman she describes as "intelligent, smart, very feminine, just as physically skilled as Bond—in fact very similar to him, though she is 'East' and he is 'West.'"

So does this liaison between Bond and Wai Lin (a woman who doesn't need to be rescued because she's an expert at Bond's own game) remain just professional in "Tomorrow Never Dies," or does it turn personal? Yeoh teases the point cleverly. "It's like we are dancing, cheek to cheek. We're too busy getting fired at, shot at. We're on the run, chasing and being chased. But oh yeah, the thought is there!" is all she'll admit to.

Brosnan is clearly impressed with Yeoh's professional skills and delighted by her personal charm. Similar feelings echoed by the crew and director, Roger Spottiswoode, denote satisfaction with the casting choice, one of the fresh twists each new Bond movie needs to keep the genre vital and current. "This cast is excellent," stresses Brosnan, "and the script has real elegance and grit and is just as muscular as 'GoldenEye.' But I think you will see a real new departure in style, which Roger Spottiswoode brings to all this."

The British-born Spottiswoode has made a wide variety of films, working mainly in America both in features and television. His movie resume includes "Under Fire," "Air America," "Stop! Or My Mom Will Shoot" and "Turner + Hooch." For TV, he has helmed "And The Band Played On" and, most recently, the visually innovative "Murder Live."

In jeans and jacket, gray-haired with glasses on a beaky nose, he looks like a teacher and moves around the set unobtrusively.

When he gets a few moments to sit down to talk, Spottiswoode mentions the "confidence" he sees in Brosnan's performance, which was previously equalled only those many years ago by the original Bond, Connery. "Pierce has grace, a sense of irony—he doesn't take himself too seriously. He has assumed the character wonderfully without in any way trying to be Connery, and now this second time it is clear he has real confidence in what he is doing," says the director, who seems to be slowly warming to the task of discussing work he'd probably rather be just doing.

"The fun and the difficulty of doing a Bond film is that people have enormous expectations," Spottiswoode says. "Everyone wants to give you free advice about everything, from what new gadgets there should be to what the villain or the women should be like. Everyone has an opinion. The challenge is how to renew and change it and move it forward so that it's modern and a thriller of the '90s, but still a Bond film. And also you have the problem in that everyone else is trying to make their action films Bondish, so you are competing not only with Bond's own past but with what other people are doing now."

"I always wanted to be Bond... It's as though this role was written for me—a real woman of the '90s."

—Actress Michelle Yeoh, Wai Lin in "TND"

The director agrees that he is bringing a new visual style to this, the 18th Bond film since Her Majesty's Secret Service agent first hit the big screen in "Dr. No." Spottiswoode describes that approach as "slightly more realistic but still high style and character driven like the '60s films were, but with a lot of visual energy." One sequence of particularly high energy will be the chase scene, which was begun on Far East locations and will be completed on the adjacent backlot, which this day is nearing the end of the elaborate set dressing necessary to turn it into an oriental market through which a helicopter will chase a motorcycle. Market stalls, stuffed with food and wares, lie under overhanging roofs; elevated walkways are draped with clothing and possessions. The track for the helicopter and camera runs down the center. Mayhem looks assured.

"We have to try to do two or three scenes that have never been done before," Spottiswoode says. He reveals that, needing to think of a new twist to the "vegetable carts overturned" moments of this market chase, he recalled an incident that occurred during a stunt when he was filming "Air America." A steel tire iron held aloft was accidentally sliced through by a hovering helicopter. "No one was hurt, but remembering what a helicopter blade could do I thought it would work to use the helicopter blades to destroy this market as Pierce and Michelle are chased into a cul-de-sac and over the rooftops on their motorbike."

The script, credited to screenwriter Bruce Feirstein, reflects input from a number of the major behind-the-scenes players, including Michael G. Wilson, who co-produces with Barbara Broccoli. Wilson and Broccoli also co-produced "GoldenEye," though at that time Cubby Broccoli was still alive and available for creative consultation. Since Broccoli's death, Wilson admits, "there's a big void. He was our mentor as well as being my stepfather and Barbara's father. But we want to continue doing what he wanted to do, which was to provide good, solid, escapist entertainment so that for two hours people can forget their woes."

"GoldenEye" had the smarts to acknowledge some of Bond's anachronistic behavior, in scenes such as the tart-tongued moment when his boss, M, played by Dame Judi Dench, calls him "a sexist, misogynist dinosaur, a relic of the Cold War." The film also possessed the self-mocking humor to refer a number of times to the "boys with toys" antics of the hero and his male enemies. This new film, an Eon production, to

The PANALOGIC Cinema Automation System

TOTAL SYSTEM INTEGRATION™

The PANALOGIC Cinema Automation System introduces a totally new concept in cinema automation. A highly flexible, fully integrated electronics package that takes the hassle out of automation design and installation, and allows total customization of every aspect of the automation process. At the heart of the new Panalogic automation system is the RC140 Control Panel, the design of which takes all of the best features of existing systems, discards all of the worst and combines them into a brand new concept called TOTAL SYSTEM INTEGRATION. The RC140 Control Panel provides a new level of user friendliness for error free operation even by inexperienced users. Gone are the rows and rows of pushbuttons, the confusing labels and procedures, and in their place, a new, easy to use control interface that takes cinema automation into the next century.

TOTAL SYSTEM INTEGRATION
- the answer for eliminating operator confusion and high installation costs!

The PANALOGIC Cinema Automation System integrates all of the cinema equipment controls into one control panel. Projectors, lights, curtains, sound, even the booth monitor - everything is at your fingertips in one 3-unit panel that can be rack mounted or wall mounted in any convenient position. Gone is the confusing array of push-buttons and indicators that has to be scanned through by eye every time you want to change a simple function. Programming automation systems has never been so easy and yet so powerful.

Indeed the TOTAL SYSTEM INTEGRATION is so powerful it is in full control of every situation from a single screen to a complete Cinema. Communications between all system components are in two wire serial format so cabling is fast and low cost. Both RS232 and RS485 communications formats are provided.

NALOGIC Cinema Automation System can also be supplied with the control panel integrated into the front panel of the PANASTEREO CSP1200 Cinema Sound Processor saving both valuable space and equipment cost.

See the new Panalogic CA1400 at booth 710 at the Show East Convention in Atlantic City.

WAR PATH

Director PAUL VERHOEVEN Returns to the Sci-Fi Genre With TriStar's Big-Budget "STARSHIP TROOPERS"

by Kim Williamson

It looked to him then, says filmmaker Paul Verhoeven, like "a special effect. For a child of two, what can you say: This looks like a lot of flames. It was interesting. Of course, you could see the Luftwaffe. They were flying over. They were bombing."

It's just past noon on an L.A.-blue day in August, and the Dutch-born Verhoeven, now aged 59, is having lunch with BOXOFFICE in the Rita Hayworth commissary on the famed Sony (nee MGM) lot in Culver City, Calif. Prominently displayed in a silver poster case near the restaurant's entrance, the first in a row of posters for such current and upcoming Columbia and TriStar fare as "Gattaca" and "Godzilla," is the one-sheet for Verhoeven's new "Starship Troopers." (Tagline: "A New Kind of Enemy. A New Kind of War.")

But the man who has made his Hollywood repute with films controversial for their violence and sexuality—"Flesh + Blood," "RoboCop," "Total Recall," "Basic Instinct" and "Showgirls"—is recalling a real-life moment, a half-century ago and a continent and ocean away, as a toddler during the Second World War. On May 14, 1940, his family having just relocated to Rotterdam's outskirts from his Amsterdam birthplace, Verhoeven stood witness to the brutal bombing of the port city that killed 980 people and destroyed 20,000 buildings. At the time, the German attack—which came after all Dutch resistance had ceased—stood as history's most devastating single air offensive. "We were not in the center of Rotterdam," Verhoeven says simply. "But you could see it, of course."

Yet that day was to be only a preface to his World War II experiences. In 1943, his parents and their only child moved to a new abode outside The Hague. "Our house was very close to the launching pads of the V-1 [the German rockets that rained down on southern England during the war's second half]. The V-1s would go right over our heads.

"So the English and the Americans, but mostly the English, were continuously bombing the area to destroy these launching pads," Verhoeven says. "You would see that in the night: You would open your windows, you would look up, and you would see the searchlights and the [exploding anti-aircraft] flak. Of course, you couldn't see the planes in the night, but you would see when they would be hit, and then you would see them burning and coming down. And crash."

BATTLE LINE: In the wake of an alien attack on Buenos Aires, human dead are retrieved from among building and bug rubble.

"I think these visions are in ['Starship Troopers']," Verhoeven concludes. "With spaceships in this case, of course. And this is against bugs, not Germans."

The evening before, entering under a refurbished pink-and-yellow neon Loews marquee that graces the studio's Cary Grant Theatre, about 100 specially invited members of the press come to see two advance reels of Verhoeven's adaptation of Robert A. Heinlein's 1959 science-fiction novel. The story: a group of high-school graduates enter the armed forces and, after a rigorous boot camp, wage intergalactic battle against insect-like warriors on distant planets. One journalist, in the dimness not seeing the black-attired Verhoeven near a mid-theatre control board, bumps into the director and apologizes. He doesn't reply.

Verhoeven was already an experienced moviemaker in his native Netherlands—where he made the likes of "Turkish Delight," Oscar-nominated for the best foreign-language film of 1973, and the 1979 "Soldier of Orange," a WWII story of Dutch university students who join the Resistance—before a phone call from Steven Spielberg in 1980 persuaded him to try his luck in America. Still, Verhoeven tonight is nervous. It's the first time footage is being shown of "Starship Troopers"—and it's his first film after his much-pilloried 1995 "Showgirls" (as one reviewer foresaw, "There will be more hooters in the audience than onscreen")—so Verhoeven's silent unease is understandable.

Moving into action at the theatre's front, though, Verhoeven seems comfortable enough to tell a joke. Explaining that what tonight's audience will be seeing begins about 60 minutes into the movie, he says the characterizations of the multitude of players onscreen will already have been developed. "That is there—but I cannot prove it to you," he says. The journalists laugh. "Remember it's a war movie," Verhoeven closes, just before the lights fade to black, "so it's not only lighthearted."

Indeed not: Although the footage includes scenes of comic fraternization and simple fisticuffs between young bucks, incipient romance among the Mobile Infantry's bi-gender ranks, and back story (Buenos Aires, home of the story's hero, Johnny Rico, has already been obliterated by enemy attack), the showcase sequence is Earth's starship invasion of the aliens' home planet of Klendathu. It's a D-Day gone horribly wrong. Plasma bugs, a sort of giant ground-based firefly that can shoot far aloft a kind of biological dynamite, bring one after another of Earth's mightiest space vessels flaming down through the atmosphere. Lander vehicles that make it safely to the planet discharge mammoth waves of infantry, only to have hundreds of thousands of those valiant soldiers cut to pieces—quite literally—by fast-moving warrior bugs. Retreat is called; the camera rests on a devastated landscape, dotted with the corpses and parts of corpses of insects and humans.

A mix of darkness and light, flesh and soil, it's a ghastly but not surprising mise en scene, coming from a filmmaker who as a child saw Germans "picking up pieces of pilots," who as an adult believes "the natural state of my mind I feel is still more war than peace."

The psychology that Verhoeven brought to the project is, of course, only prologue in bottom-line terms. The studio's focus now for the movie is in generating audience interest in going to see this first big film of the Christmas moviegoing season.

On the day of BOXOFFICE's visit with Verhoeven, the Motion Picture Association of America announces the rating for the TriStar release: R for graphic sci-fi violence and gore, and for some language and nudity. The director is unfazed. "It was always an R," he says, with a finality that recalls Verhoeven's foreknowledge that "Showgirls" would be an NC-17. "There's nothing you can do about it. I mean, [deciding] 'let's change this movie completely to make it to a PG-13' would defy the whole setup of these bugs, wouldn't it? I don't know how you could make these scenes work for a PG-13. Because that's what [the bugs] do: They cut you in two. They stab you to death."

Verhoeven's previous exercises in the sci-fi genre, 1987's "RoboCop" ($53.4 million domestic) and 1990's "Total Recall" ($119.3 million), were also Rs, but their older stars—Peter Weller and Nancy Allen, and Arnold Schwarz-

BATTLE STAR

Newcomer Casper Van Dien Is a "Trooper"

Hollywood seems to have suddenly woken up to the leading-man potential of Casper Van Dien. Not surprisingly, his soldier-of-fortune good looks had earned him roles in television in the daytime drama "One Life to Live" and the nighttime soap "Beverly Hills, 90210," but now the 28-year-old is moving to the bigscreen here, there and everywhere. He's going to be the next Tarzan in Live's "Tarzan and Jane," co-starring Jane March ("Color of Night"). He's playing the screen-idol title role in "James Dean: Race With Destiny" (release pending). And, opposite Rod Steiger and Natasha Wagner, he's in a thriller, "Revenant," about hip vampires living in L.A. But first he'll be seen warring with giant bugs in Paul Verhoeven's sci-fi adventure "Starship Troopers." Van Dien, who describes himself as "an optimist" who has been "pretty lucky my whole life," called BOXOFFICE from the El Paso, Texas location where he has been shooting the movie "On the Border," which he describes as a "who's-screwing-who story, in more ways than one." He talked about what a trooper he is, literally and figuratively.

BOXOFFICE: Was it easy to act opposite giant bugs?

CASPER VAN DIEN: It was no problem to imagine them coming at you when you have Paul Verhoeven yelling and screaming "Bugs are coming! Bugs are coming!" at the top of his lungs, his arms flailing in an attack mode! But of course it is a combination of computer graphics—which means little orange markers telling you where they are—and huge models and little models and animatronics and dead bugs on the ground. You have to use your imagination, but the input they gave us with illustrations and models made it very vivid. And, as they had gotten the money to make the movie by creating a sequence [see Paul Tippett sidebar, p. 20] showing how the huge bugs attack, they were able to show us that too. I think I saw it 33 times in boot camp and before filming started.

BOXOFFICE: Why did Verhoeven take you and the other actors who play the troopers to that boot camp in Wyoming before filming started?

VAN DIEN: It put us through the rigorous physical training we needed and helped us all understand military procedure and etiquette.

BOXOFFICE: Didn't the fact you attended military school and your father and grandfathers were in the Navy mean you were ahead of the game?

VAN DIEN: Yes, I found a lot in the character of Johnny Rico to identify with, which made me certain I could do this role. I'm a pretty organized man, but I'm also a risk taker who enjoys going out on a limb. I really believe in the military. I think it gives backbone to a lot of men and women and instills respect and purpose. Military school provided the discipline you need to deal with society and to learn to work with people to get a job done. This film was run like a well-oiled military project—not over budget, smoothly, and everyone knew their job and got it done.

BOXOFFICE: What's the nastiest encounter you had with one of the bugs?

VAN DIEN: I rode on top of this tanker-size bug, 28 feet up in the air. I got a bit bruised and banged up, but it was a lot of fun and actually I was in better shape than most of the stuntmen. I had to throw a grenade at the bug and then jump on it to try to kill it. I jumped off a mountain to land on the bug and that earned me a stunt buckle.

BOXOFFICE: Is this film very violent?

VAN DIEN: There is a lot of violence but, hey, it's a movie—it's a huge cartoon. You only see two people killed by other people. Everyone else is killed by bugs! But it's also a love story, and it's about how Johnny finds himself through his success in the Mobile Infantry.

BOXOFFICE: Did you have to look in even better shape for "Tarzan and Jane"?

VAN DIEN: I do wear an itty-bitty loincloth. I was like that—barefoot and nearly naked—in the jungle for four months, so I would get up very early each day to work out. I think this "Tarzan" is going to be the closest to [Edgar Rice] Burroughs' conception. Tarzan had so often been depicted as big, strong and dumb. If he was dumb, he would have died. But this is a more "Indiana Jones"-type of Tarzan, which will be fun for the whole family.

BOXOFFICE: What do you like to do when you do have free time?

VAN DIEN: I rock climb, horseback ride, play football and baseball, and do karate and aerobics. I write, I read, I study. I love learning new things, particularly languages. I even managed to learn a little bit of Zulu when I was filming "Tarzan" in Africa. Everything you do is a stepping stone. If you don't learn something along the way, you are a fool.—Bridget Byrne

BUG BRAIN

Phil Tippett Again Draws on His Monster Talents

It all started with "King Kong." Phil Tippett first saw the classic creature feature on '50s TV as a child, and from that moment his future was set in motion—or stop-motion. "I had to figure out how all that stuff was done," Tippett explains. The Oscar and Emmy award-winning visual effects artist has spent his life not only figuring out how the giant ape came alive but also bringing to life many of his own creatures. Jabba the Hutt from "Return of the Jedi," the robots in "RoboCop" and the T-Rex in "Jurassic Park" are just a few among Tippett's personal monster menagerie. Today, he owns his own visual effects shop, Berkeley, Calif.-based Tippett Studio, and his latest effort is "Starship Troopers." In the futuristic war movie, the enemy is an army of, well, bugs. But large bugs. With an attitude.

BOXOFFICE: Is "Starship Troopers" the biggest film you've worked on?

PHIL TIPPETT: Yeah, by far. It's like the "Lawrence of Arabia" of sci-fi pictures.

BOXOFFICE: Is it true the studio made you shoot a test of the bugs before it would commit to the project?

TIPPETT: It's strange. The studios are just into tests now, to justify going ahead with stuff. It's not as though one's reputation or skill can justify taking the risk. So we went out to Vasquez Rocks and shot [Olympic] gold medalist Mitch Gaylord dressed up in an armored trooper's outfit. Paul directed it. [Laughs] We ripped Mitch apart.

BOXOFFICE: Is the film going to be as violent as that suggests?

TIPPETT: It's a Paul Verhoeven war/monster picture. I don't think it's going to be anything too soft and cuddly.

BOXOFFICE: "Bug movies" seem to be in these days, what with "Mimic" and "Men In Black."

TIPPETT: Part of that is a strategic decision because of the nature of the technology. The computer graphics [are better at creating] exoskeletons than continuous fleshy surfaces.

BOXOFFICE: Such as human beings. But aren't you also using computer graphics to render humans when they're being ripped apart by the bugs?

TIPPETT: Oh, sure. I characterize them as "computer graphic stunt doubles."

BOXOFFICE: That's a great term. But the bugs are obviously the main show. They're divided into different breeds, aren't they?

TIPPETT: Yes. The film pretty much follows the generic rules of World War II pictures, so the "warrior bugs" are the infantry. The "plasma bugs"—these giant three-story bugs that shoot plasma out of their butts like a big stink bug and blast spaceships down out of the sky—are kind of like the guns of Navarone, the heavy artillery. The "hoppers" are the equivalent of the air force. The "tanker bugs" are like tanks that have viscous liquid, like flame throwers, that they spray on people and melt them. The king bug—the "brain bug"—is the evil emperor. He rides on the back of his minions that are called "chariot bugs."

BOXOFFICE: It's what they used to call "a cast of thousands," except these thousands are all computer-generated. Was that the biggest challenge on "Troopers"—the sheer enormity of it?

TIPPETT: That was the main thing. The problem with special effects-type pictures is that you're dealing with a lot of virtual material. You're on the set with maybe 200 to 300 people, and you're asking them to imagine something that isn't there, that you will put in later on. It's very important that everybody be all on the same page of the choreography and the camera work. There was a tremendous amount of production meetings so that Paul and I knew what the bugs were going to do, and then for communicating that effectively with Jost Vacano, the director of photography, and then for carrying that continuity all the way through the work with the editor, Mark Goldblatt. And assembling all the material so that it would make sense later on when we started to put our bugs in the shots.

BOXOFFICE: Has this given you the urge to direct yourself?

TIPPETT: When you're safe at home in bed with the covers pulled up really close, you think about directing, yeah. But then you go out and see how these guys work, and it's a pretty tough job. It's brutal.

BOXOFFICE: What's in the future for Tippett Studio?

TIPPETT: We're in the process now of working on the Disney project "My Favorite Martian." It's got a lot of cute and funny stuff in it. And then we have a Universal project, called "Virus," that has a big scary monster-type alien thing. So we're going to be doing more of that.—Michael Payne enegger and Sharon Stone, respectively—perhaps attracted adults in numbers that made up for the restrictions on under-17 attendance. But "Starship Troopers" could reverse that demo draw, as its leads are young, relative newcomers. Casper Van Dien (who plays Johnny Rico; see sidebar, p. 19) is best known from TV's "Beverly Hills, 90210"; Dina Meyer ("Dragonheart") is another "90210" alum; and both Denise Richards ("nowhere") and Patrick Muldoon are veterans of another young-teen TV favorite, "Melrose Place."

"If ['Starship Troopers'] is 'Melrose Place in Space,' I don't know. I don't think so," Verhoeven says. "[But] this is not 'Memphis Belle'"—the 1990 WWII movie that cast a decade older than the true ages of the Army Air Force pilots the film portrayed. That decision "didn't work," he says. "'Let's destroy the story and go for something different'—I don't believe in that. I don't believe in second-guessing your audience.

"This is about young people that come from high school. That's the story! They are these young kids, they're sitting in class, you introduce the audience to the society, and then we go to boot camp. And then war breaks out and they go off to die."

That "Starship Troopers" is a throwback to two types of movies familiar to older audiences could help interest them. "It really is a Second World War movie in its tone, like the movies in the '40s. You get to know certain people, you build [their characters], and then at the end of the war you look back and say, 'Well, only a couple survived,'" Verhoeven says. But "Starship Troopers" in its combination of war and humor—part boot, part camp—also recalls another well-known genre. "When I was a child, my favorite movie was 'The War of the Worlds.' But [I liked] all the science-fiction movies, even the B-movies. This is an upgraded B-movie in a way, isn't it? An animal that's big and ferocious—that's of course an element of the movies of the '50s."

Budgeted at $90+ million, "Starship Troopers" disembarks on November 7, and Verhoeven expects that the film will succeed with diverse ages. "It's not a movie for 'kid-kids,' of 12 or 10, but perhaps even them. [Ages] 14, 15, absolutely. They will see [the TV spots] and drive their parents crazy [to take them].

"And I think this movie is good enough if you're 22, and it's good even at 30. It has all of that ['Star Wars' element], but it has its own tone and its own dimension of looking at the world, at the universe. And I think it's a thrill," Verhoeven says, "to go inside that world.

"People will have the feeling that 'here is one of my ultimate fantasies.'"

"Starship Troopers." Starring Casper Van Dien, Denise Richards, Dina Meyer and Jake Busey. Directed by Paul Verhoeven. Written by Ed Neumeier. Produced by Alan Marshall and Jon Davison. A TriStar release. SF/action. Rated R. Opens 11/7 wide.

Dear Exhibitor,

The SDDS sound system played an important role in the success of MEN IN BLACK. Not only was the dynamic range extraordinary compared to a non-digital sound system, but the low end sub-woofer frequencies added a great deal of manliness to the soundtrack.

What separates Sony's SDDS digital system from any other digital format is the eight channels of sound. The spread in sound, especially music, gives a sense of scope and richness that no other format matches.

More and more, it is the sound system that creates a sense of scale, scope and importance to the movie-going experience. I was very pleased that MEN IN BLACK was released in SDDS.

Best regards,

With Spielberg's "Amistad," Debbie Allen's Ship Finally Comes In

by Joseph McBride

IN THE BELLY OF THE BEAST: Allen (r.) on the set of "Amistad."

Behind every dream project there is a dreamer. In the case of Steven Spielberg's new film, "Amistad," opening from DreamWorks this December, that dreamer is Debbie Allen. The multi-talented choreographer, actress, director and producer spent 10 frustrating years trying to persuade studios to make the film before she took it to Spielberg.

No one else in Hollywood was interested in the story of 53 African captives who mutinied against their Spanish captors on the schooner Amistad in 1839, before being tried for murder and eventually set free in the United States. "I took it to a lot of people and I just got rejected," recalls Allen, who is African-American. "I took it personally—it was hard not to. They were saying the story wasn't important. They said, 'Nobody's interested in some slaves.'

Allen first became aware of the story in 1978. While browsing in the bookstore of her alma mater, Howard University, she found an anthology, "The Amistad I," edited by Charles Harris. She optioned William Owen's fictionalized account, "Black Mutiny," in 1984, then took the project to Spielberg after he won his 1994 Academy Award for directing "Schindler's List." Allen already was friendly with Spielberg, whose adopted African-American son, Theo, was a classmate of Allen's son, Norman Nixon Jr.

Allen brought the project to Spielberg "because I knew he would understand it," she says. "I knew his people [Spielberg is Jewish] had suffered. And I needed someone who was powerful, and I needed a great, great filmmaker. Steven was so committed and passionate. From the beginning, we were on the same page.

"I always thought 'Amistad' should be a court drama that opens people's eyes," Allen says. "The Africans uplift everyone. They uplift the Supreme Court, who were just about all pro-slavers, to make that decision. And they uplift the abolitionists, a disenfranchised group who then have an image to come together with.

"I always wanted it to be called 'Amistad' [Spanish for 'Friendship']. The title is really a double-entendre, because there's this ship called the Amistad upon which the revolt took place, a very hateful situation, and later on all these people came together who were friends of the Africans to stand up for freedom."

Spielberg's choice of the $41 million "Amistad" as his first directing project for his new studio, DreamWorks, continues his long but largely unheralded personal identification with the black struggle. As a victim of anti-Semitic persecution in high school, Spielberg was passionately interested in the civil rights movement of the 1960s. Along with 1985's "The Color Purple," based on Alice Walker's novel about an abused black woman in the early 1900s South, he directed black actors in the leads of a "Night Gallery" TV episode and his segment of "Twilight Zone—The Movie."

Despite his apparent empathy with "Color Purple's" Celie (Whoopi Goldberg), Spielberg was pilloried by many critics who accused him of a cynical ploy to use the film to win an Oscar. The film received 11 nominations, but Spielberg was conspicuously absent in the directing category. Critics also took Spielberg to task this year for giving Jeff Goldblum a black daughter in "The Lost World: Jurassic Park," accusing him of doing so only to pander to the black audience.

But that casting choice, on which the film subtly avoided comment, was hardly a stretch for Spielberg. Besides Theo, another of his seven children is black—a daughter, Mikaela, whom he and wife Kate Capshaw adopted in 1996. During the filming of "Amistad," Spielberg declared, "I am making this film for my black children and my white children. They all need to know this story."

Allen shares producing credit with Spielberg and Colin Wilson ("The Lost World: Jurassic Park"), and the intense, day-to-day involvement of a black creative partner might defuse criticism against Spielberg this time around. "Steven Spielberg and I have had a baby child!" Allen exults, metaphorically. But Walker's active role in the making of "The Color Purple" provided no such insulation, and Allen had to assuage Spielberg's anxieties before he committed to "Amistad."

"Steven, that was then, this is now," she told him. "I think things will be looked at differently." Allen points out that "Schindler's List" persuaded people of Spielberg's emotional depth, and that "Amistad," unlike "The Color Purple," comes at a time when there has been a relatively wide variety of films dealing with the black experience.

For those who might still question why a white director was chosen for such a project, Allen explains that not only was Spielberg the sole person willing and able to get "Amistad" made, it is not simply a "black" film. Morgan Freeman has top billing as an abolitionist leader, and the story has what Spielberg calls "only one heartbeat"—taking a single character viewpoint, that of the heroic captive Cinque (Djimon Hounsou, an actor and model from the African country of Benin). But the Africans also had prominent white allies, from ex-President John Quincy Adams (Anthony Hopkins) to their lawyer Roger Baldwin (Matthew McConaughey).

Some advance criticism has already been lodged against "Amistad" as another sign of Spielberg's alleged tendency to find uplift in unlikely subject matter, from the Holocaust to slavery ("Schindler's List." screenwriter Steven Zaillian wrote "Amistad" with David Franzoni). Calling the captives in Amistad "slaves," however, is a misnomer. In setting them free, the Supreme Court did not find slavery illegal in the U.S. but ruled instead that the Africans were not legal property of their captors and that they had a right to self-defense. Allen also points out that the denouement hardly was unambiguously happy: 18 of the captives died before being liberated. Cinque returned home to Sierra Leone to find his family vanished, and the unresolved slavery issue continued to fester until the Civil War erupted.

Given the recent inability of some serious films with black themes to find an audience, Allen declares she's "like a bloodhound on a mission to make sure the world knows that 'Amistad' is coming. [Black filmmakers] can't say, 'Hollywood is doing this to us' if 'Rosewood' doesn't make the same money as 'Booty Call.'"

Juggling two films simultaneously as he did with "Schindler's List" and "Jurassic Park," Spielberg edited "Amistad" with Michael Kahn in London this summer while filming the upcoming World War II drama "Saving Private Ryan." The director is "sensitive about how 'Amistad' comes out," Allen says, "because it's not 'Titanic,' it's not 'The Lost World.' The intelligent thing to do is to let this baby bird get its wings and fly, and I think Steven's of that mind too. He's very protective of this movie in terms of getting it so right."

STARSHIP TROOPERS

JOIN THE MOBILE INFANTRY AND SEE THE UNIVERSE

September, 1997

Dear Exhibitor,

I am in the midst of post production on my new film, STARSHIP TROOPERS, due to hit your screens on November 7.

From a creative standpoint, STARSHIP TROOPERS is the most ambitious and challenging film of my directing career. We are breaking all the rules to create the ultimate visual and sound experience that I hope your audiences will never forget!

We have been working on an 8 channel sound design and score, scrutinizing each and every single element. The two additional speaker channels behind the screen (left extra and right extra) have been maximized as a separate stereo pair to keep all the complex sound effects, music and dialogue tracks separate and clear.

The end result will be a unique sound experience of far-ranging proportions, which only SDDS can truly reproduce in your theatres.

I personally appeal to you to play STARSHIP TROOPERS in SDDS and especially in 8 channels. Your audiences deserve to hear this film as I intended.

Thank you very much for your support.

Best regards,

Paul Verhoeven

AN ANIMATED DISCUSSION

BOXOFFICE speaks with Bill Mechanic About "Anastasia," Fox's First Major Foray into Animation by Christine James

ROYAL RUSE: Dimitri (voice of John Cusack) and Vladimir (Kelsey Grammer) plan to pass off an orphan girl (Meg Ryan) as the lost princess Anastasia.

Bill Mechanic, chairman and CEO of Fox Filmed Entertainment, knows there's a lot riding on "Anastasia." "There's something going on more than just the movie," he explains. "Most movies are movies, but this one's like a whole initiative for us. We've been on it for three years now, building an animation facility, building animation talent, taking a company that has no experience or background in [animation] and trying to do great things." As the first release from the studio's new animation arm, "Anastasia" marks Fox's rejuvenated dedication to the medium that to date is still considered strictly Disney domain. Due out this Thanksgiving with abundant fanfare and promotion, "Anastasia" is being poised to shift the borders of that territory. Disney is obviously taking the threat seriously: subsidiary ABC has refused to air commercials for "Anastasia" during "The Wonderful World of Disney" show (though Fox Broadcasting continues to air "Hercules" ads).

With Meg Ryan voicing the title heroine and a supporting voice cast that includes John Cusack, Christopher Lloyd, Hank Azaria, Angela Lansbury and Kelsey Grammer, "Anastasia" is being primed as a pull-out-all-the-stops event picture. In addition to its tie-ins with Burger King and Coca-Cola, Fox has signed with numerous other promotional partners to ensure "Anastasia" has a big impact on the marketplace.

> "I think great movies and great stories come out of some difficult circumstances. I don't think it's all about sweetness and light."

Of previous attempts by other studios to stake a claim in animation, Mechanic says, "I think they've been carpetbaggers. They come in trying to take from somebody else instead of being serious about what they're trying to do. They made no commitment. And if you go back, in 1984, Disney was in bad shape. They were really not succeeding in the animated business. The last few pictures had all not worked, and it was really ['Anastasia' director and former Disney employee] Don Bluth that led the way to the renaissance of the animated film. It was [Bluth's] 'American Tail' and 'Land Before Time' that were the all-time boxoffice champs at that moment."

Fox itself has released animated films in the past, but not with any cohesive development strategy—or boxoffice success. "I consider what has happened up till now as dipping a toe in the water," Mechanic observes. "So many people felt that it was only the province of Disney that they never really approached it with any kind of seriousness."

Even Mechanic is hard-pressed to name some of Fox's previous efforts in the genre. "'Pagemaster,' 'Ferngully'...um, something in the forest, what was it?—'Once Upon a Forest.' In the far past, [Fox] had done 'Wizards.' But there's no real tradition to it, and again, I think there's something about being serious about a business."

"Being serious" entails, for starters, building an animation studio in Phoenix that employs about 350 people, as well as a satellite arm in Los Angeles. Additionally, Fox is developing projects from the ground up, as opposed to simply acquiring completed works.

"We're not just saying 'Show us the finished film and we'll decide whether we want to distribute it.' We're deeply involved in it," says Mechanic. "We've made a long-term commitment to Don Bluth and [co-director] Gary Goldman; we're in the middle of our second picture ["Planet Ice," an outer space fantasy/adventure]; and we're ready to start our third picture. So it's an ongoing process, and we've retooled a lot of the company, including licensing and merchandising, to be able to handle it, and to have everybody invested in what it is that we're trying to do."

Historically, despite their best efforts, no studio other than Disney has yet been able to achieve blockbuster success in the animation milieu. In response to industry-wide skepticism as to whether another studio can become a major player in the market, Mechanic is pragmatic—and optimistic. "I approach this as a business where everybody's going to doubt you. Which is why we didn't talk about the movie, we didn't show the movie, we didn't deal with the movie publicly for quite some time—until we could actually show people we have the goods.

"There's certainly no reason to believe that one company has the market cornered," he continues. "It is just not fathomable. It would be the same thing in reverse [when Disney was an animation-only studio] and they weren't in live-action, to say Disney couldn't do a live-action business. A company that had only one tradition could follow only that one tradition. Well, that's just not the case."

With Don Bluth having been one of Disney's former lead animators, it's not surprising that the characters in "Anastasia" have a Disneyesque look and feel (an observation Mechanic concedes is "fair to say"). Differentiating "Anastasia" from Disney fare was not a target goal, he notes. "We focused on the story we wanted to tell and what we wanted to have the movie feel like. It wasn't so much to do something the same or do something different, but to make a movie."

Mechanic cites several elements of "Anastasia" that he feels will make it a success: "The characters are very real, even though they're drawn. The emotions and the intellect—you can totally buy into it as an audience. It has great music, it's funny, and it tells a well-rounded story."

On the surface, the story of Anastasia could be viewed as a romantic fantasy fairytale: A beautiful young woman suffering from amnesia discovers she may actually be a princess. However, the predicating events—i.e., the Bolshevik uprising resulting in the slaughter of Anastasia's family—is not exactly the sort of subject matter one would associate with an animated musical. Set in Russia in the early 1900s and loosely based on the events that occurred after the slaying of Czar Nicholas Romanov II and his family—a massacre the youngest daughter was rumored to have escaped—"Anastasia's" plotline is arguably a disquieting one for the medium (though certainly no more so than, say, "The Hunchback of Notre Dame"). But the mystery of Anastasia holds a Cinderella-story allure that's a standard in the genre.

"I think great movies and great stories come out of some difficult circumstances," explains Mechanic of Fox's decision to turn this emotionally and politically tempestuous story into an animated film. "I don't think it's all about sweetness and light. And I think that's part of what people have done. They've talked down to children." Nevertheless, with regard to how closely "Anastasia" will be adhering to the historical account, it appears to have been significantly Pocahontasized. For example, in this telling, Russia's last royal family is not executed by the Bolsheviks; instead, they die at the hands of the evil wizard Rasputin and his albino bat sidekick.

"If we had children running out of the theatre, I'd say we screwed up."

But the death of Anastasia's family will be an important element, says Mechanic. "What happens to the royal family is what establishes the emotional reality of our movie. It's only a backstory, but it is there to establish who this girl is and what her loss is. It will affect people. I don't think we've brushed over it." However, given the large kiddie contingent anticipated in "Anastasia's" audiences, the harrowing elements have been kept to a minimum: "If we had children running out of the theatre, I'd say we screwed up," Mechanic says, laughing.

"If I was a historian and I wanted to judge this as a historian, I don't know that I would say 'Oooh, they really nailed the story,'" Mechanic acknowledges. "I think we took creative license with it. So I don't know if we'll pass those tests. We're making a movie. It's sort of like, somebody asked about 'Volcano,' 'Can it happen here?' Well, you know, can it happen here, is that what we're trying to do? We weren't making a documentary."

And what does Mechanic believe happened to the real Anastasia?

"I don't know," he says. "I read the books and watched with fascination last year when they applied DNA tests to the bones [of the murdered Romanovs], and luckily for us discovered that Anastasia was not found with the rest of the family, which does leave her mystery unsolved. Which I think is good for us."

"Anastasia." Voices by Meg Ryan, John Cusack and Christopher Lloyd. Directed and produced by Don Bluth and Gary Goldman. Written by Eric Tuchman and Susan Gauthier & Bruce Graham. A Fox release. Nov. 21.

PULP CONVICTION

LAWRENCE BENDER Takes Independent Producing to New Heights With His Latest Tarantino Collaboration "JACKIE BROWN"

by Wade Major

Four months into their tenancy at Miramax Pictures' new Los Angeles digs (formerly occupied by the late, great Hemdale) A Band Apart Productions is still settling in. Lawrence Bender's office is especially spare with unpacked boxes forming a series of neck-high columns. "I just barely got back," he apologizes, detailing the breakneck summer pace that has kept him juggling producing chores on three major year-end releases. "This job is so all-encompassing."

In addition to "Jackie Brown," his hotly-anticipated third teaming with pal and partner Quentin Tarantino, Bender is also putting the finishing touches on Boaz Yakin's "A Price Below Rubies," with "Jerry Maguire" star Renee Zellweger, as well as Gus Van Sant's "Good Will Hunting," starring Robin Williams and Matt Damon. "'Good Will Hunting' was greenlit in the middle of shooting 'A Price Below Rubies' in New York," recalls Bender. "And 'Good Will Hunting' shoots in Toronto and Boston. So I was caught between shooting one movie in New York in the middle of a freezing winter while having to prep and cast another movie in Toronto and Boston. Then we locked the deal for 'Jackie Brown' to start shooting three weeks before we wrapped 'Good Will Hunting.' So for 12 weeks, I'd work all day in L.A. on 'Jackie Brown,' then jump the red-eye. It was this triangle. When everything wrapped except for 'Jackie Brown,' I thought, 'Thank God! Just one location!'"

Even at a chaotic pace, it's obvious Bender loves what he does. Though more reserved and soft-spoken than his manic partner, Bender shares Tarantino's passion for the magic of moviemaking. It's hard not to see the two of them as the proverbial "kids set loose in a candy store"—with one very important distinction: these "kids" run the candy store.

Trained primarily as an actor, dancer and, of all things, a civil engineer, Bender has risen fast among the ranks of Hollywood's hottest producers, working increasingly with other directors on such films as "Fresh," "Killing Zoe" and "White Man's Burden." But his association with Tarantino transcends any other: "I know it sounds cliche," he says, "but Quentin and I have a really special relationship. It means a lot to both of us because we really started out together. It's a situation where one plus one equals much more than two."

"I love making movies, but I'm not 100 percent satisfied. I don't feel that all my creative muscles have been exercised as a producer."

Not surprisingly, many industry observers agree, crediting Bender as much as Tarantino for the commercial successes of "Reservoir Dogs," "Pulp Fiction" and "From Dusk Till Dawn." "When we met," remembers Bender, "Quentin had been struggling for a long time just as I certainly had. And the meeting of the two of us, somehow, is what made it happen. If someone else produces something that he does or if I work with another director, as great an experience as it is, it's never quite the same."

That explains Bender's enthusiasm for "Jackie Brown," Tarantino's first effort as a director since 1994's "Pulp Fiction." Based on the Elmore Leonard novel "Rum Punch"—the first of four Leonard novels acquired by Miramax for Tarantino—"Jackie Brown" features a quirky cast that promises to rival "Pulp Fiction's." In addition to '70s feminist action icon Pam Grier in the title role, "Jackie Brown" also stars Robert De Niro, Samuel L. Jackson, Michael Keaton, Bridget Fonda and the resilient Robert Forster. "It's very much Quentin's writing, but it's also very much Elmore Leonard's writing. It's a great synthesis of their two styles."

Not that Tarantino and Leonard are necessarily all that far apart to begin with. It was Tarantino who persuaded John Travolta to do the film version of Leonard's "Get Shorty," which some critics derided as derivative of "Pulp Fiction." The plot of "Jackie Brown," which centers on a middle-aged stewardess' scheme to defraud her gun-running partner before he can eliminate her as a potential government witness, seems tailor-made for Tarantino's sensibilities.

Some debate has arisen, however, concerning decisions to change the lead character's race and to relocate the story from Florida to the less glamorous South Bay area of Los Angeles where Tarantino grew up. "The essence of the woman is the same," says Bender in Tarantino's defense. "Quentin is a big fan of Pam's and felt this was a great role for her to play. As to why he set it in the South Bay, it's because Quentin really knows the South Bay. He's very much a regional filmmaker, even though we don't think of Southern California as having those regional aspects."

Like Tarantino, Bender is optimistic that the film will mark a new career beginning for star Grier, whose '70s era anthems to female power—"Foxy Brown," "Sheba, Baby," and "Coffy," among others—have since evolved cult followings. "It certainly will be a great comeback for her," he says. "She's so hot and so foxy in the film. I think audiences will be very impressed."

Bender remains mindful of his other projects as well, most notably "Good Will Hunting," which came his way via Miramax co-chairman Harvey Weinstein. "Harvey, around Christmas of 1995, said to me, 'I want to give you my favorite project at Miramax. This is the movie I believe in the most of any project I have right now.' So I read the script, which was written by Matt Damon and ["Chasing Amy" star] Ben Affleck. And I really responded to it." The story of a gifted but troubled youth and his relationship with a widower-therapist quickly became a magnet for A-list talent, including director Gus Van Sant and Robin Williams, who will play the therapist opposite co-writer/star Damon. "You sometimes forget what an amazing dramatic actor Robin Williams is," says Bender, "because he doesn't play those roles that often. This is going to be just a beautiful, beautiful movie."

First up, however, will be "A Price Below Rubies," Bender's second collaboration with "Fresh" director Boaz Yakin. "It's about a young Hasidic woman, played by Renee Zellweger, coming to terms with herself," Bender says. "It's about individual versus community, about a woman finding her own strength, finding something inside of herself. And Renee is just extraordinary."

Bender's plate for 1998 is already filling up fast. Two follow-ups to "From Dusk Till Dawn" are expected to go before cameras by year's end, while active development continues on new film adaptations of "Modesty Blaise" and a non-musical "Anna and the King" starring legendary Hong Kong action hero Chow Yun-Fat.

Still, despite his success, Bender confesses to a certain degree of career anxiety. "I don't know if this is the last thing I want to do in my life. I love making movies, but I'm not 100 percent satisfied. I don't feel that all my creative muscles have been exercised as a producer. I do feel, as some point, that I want to direct. And I also feel like I need to do some more acting. There's still a lot of things in life I want to do."

JACKIE SPEAKS...

In early '70s retro classics "Foxy Brown," "Sheba, Baby" and "Coffy," Pam Grier didn't just redefine screen femininity, she revolutionized it. Her gun-wielding, butt-kicking vixen persona became instantly legendary, shattering age-old racial and gender stereotypes and, in the process, inspiring a generation of impressionable, young would-be filmmakers, including a certain Quentin Tarantino.

Twenty years and a handful of supporting roles ("Mars Attacks," "Original Gangstas," "Escape From L.A.") later, the seemingly inevitable Pam and Quentin teaming has finally occurred, adding what promises to be yet another icon to her memorable gallery: Jackie Brown.

BOXOFFICE: Would you say that Jackie Brown is in some ways a throwback to your old roles or is this a step forward in a new direction?

PAM GRIER: It's a definite step forward in a new direction. Jackie is still an independent woman, she's just a little more mature. As opposed to being a character in her twenties, she's in her forties and the film looks at how all those dynamics have changed 20 years later, through the style and the humor of Quentin's writing and Elmore Leonard's flavor. I think the character's added 20 years of maturity and wisdom help make the story infinitely more exciting.

BOXOFFICE: The word "comeback" has been thrown around a lot, with some pundits already suggesting that this role may do for you what Tarantino's "Pulp Fiction" did for Travolta.

GRIER: I wish I could say it's a comeback. But the problem with African-American actresses and actresses of color is that there's not enough work. You'll work once every four years and think you're making a comeback when that's consistently the amount of work that you're offered or which you can land.

BOXOFFICE: Which probably makes it even more flattering that Quentin rewrote what was originally a white character especially for you.

GRIER: It's more than flattering. From a spiritual point of view, it's a blessing. From a human point of view, from the point of view of my craft and the type of work that I strive to do, it's so rewarding. For any actor who's dreamed of working with him, you know you'd do anything for him. So to have him rewrite this role for me is really an honor.

BOXOFFICE: And you certainly have yourself an amazing supporting cast. When you have the opportunity to act with Robert De Niro, Sam Jackson, Michael Keaton, Bridget Fonda and Robert Forster...

GRIER: ...You better kiss yourself and hope the dream doesn't end! I quiver just thinking about it. These are people I've always wanted to work with, whom I've always admired. Then suddenly I'm working with them. We really became like family. It was one of the most supportive, energetic and creative sets I've been a part of in a long time. There was a great feeling where you didn't want to go home, where you felt you could easily work 20 hours and not feel it.

BOXOFFICE: A lot of people thought you were pioneering a new feminist direction in movies during the '70s, but the rest of the industry failed to turn the corner with you. Do you think it will ever catch up?

GRIER: I really believe that I did open a door at the time and other women weren't ready to be as physical. And there was still a mindset of not being as independent. Many women wanted to still play the traditional role of being taken care of. And not until they were finally forced by the recession and the oil embargo into having to go into the work force did they realize they had to take the reins of their family's life and do something about it. That's when they really built their confidence and saw that it was okay to be tough, okay to be smart, okay to be assertive and still be feminine and soft and caring.

BOXOFFICE: So you think the opportunities are improving?

GRIER: Well, there's Sigourney Weaver in the "Alien" films. There's "La Femme Nikita." And look at "G.I. Jane." I can go on and on. But you have to have the actresses who can take it and still open a movie and still be dynamic and still be pretty and be all the fantasies. That's a lot of work. I think it's a new era and an exciting time. I don't know if I'm a part of it, I don't know if I'm opening any doors. All I know is that doors are opening for me, and for that I am grateful.—Wade Major

HOLIDAY HIGHLIGHTS

It's time again for the season of green: trees, trimmings and boxoffice tills

Last year at this time, we praised Hollywood for the scheduling of its November lineup, which generally avoided genre and demo clashes on films' opening weekends. Once again, a megaplexer's fondest dreams seem to be coming true: November 1997, though seam-bursting at 37 entries, pretty much provides each major title at least one clear-shot weekend to reach its target audience. Yet it'll still be a slugfest right from the start; witness the 11/7 frame, with its "Mad City," "Starship Troopers," "Critical Care" and "Boogie Nights" all needing pieces of each other's audience to attain smash status.

But then come December's wintry winds. In December 1996, 16 studio releases were looking to open during the 12/20-12/27 period. This year, again fearing people will be too busy malling for presents, distributors are avoiding the month's first half; despite there being only one pre-12/15 big-title competitor—DreamWorks' opening of "Amistad," itself just limited until 12/25—Warner Bros. already moved its Dustin Hoffman/Sharon Stone starrer "Sphere" off 12/12 to Valentine's Day.

That quietude ends on 12/19, when James Cameron's "Titanic" and the 18th Bond film, "Tomorrow Never Dies," square off for teen/adult audiences, and Buena Vista's "Mr. Magoo" and Fox's "Home Alone 3" take aim at the family-fare demo. Among the heavyweight players each wading into the war within the week that follows are Kevin Costner ("The Postman"), Quentin Tarantino ("Jackie Brown"), Jack Nicholson ("As Good As It Gets"), Martin Scorsese ("Kundun"), Daniel Day-Lewis ("The Boxer") and Robert Redford, helming and starring in "The Horse Whisperer" (see photo above).

It doesn't take much horse sense to see what the industry's hot toy this Christmas season will be: screen space.

NOVEMBER

Starship Troopers

Based on the Robert A. Heinlein novel, this $90 million sci-fi actioner follows a corps of heroic men and women, all elite members of the Mobile Military, who must wage intergalactic war against aliens. Newcomer Casper Van Dien, Dina Meyer ("Johnny Mnemonic"), Jake Busey ("Twister"), Neil Patrick Harris (TV's "Doogie Howser, M.D.") and Clancy Brown ("The Shawshank Redemption") star. Paul Verhoeven ("Total Recall") directs; Ed Neumeier scripts; Alan Marshall and Jon Davison produce. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (TriStar, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: A co-production with Buena Vista's Touchstone label, this R-rater could be a significant boxoffice factor through Thanksgiving and—depending on response to the upcoming similar-genre "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation" and especially "Alien Resurrection"—on toward Christmas. Despite his misstep with "Showgirls," Verhoeven has shown a facility with SF material. Given the casting, whose draw will include one demo (young teens) closed out by the rating, make the genre the star; that the Heinlein name is a hallowed one among SF fans will help, as will bookstore tie-ins. Key date competition: "Mad City" (see P. 31).

Bean

Brit TV superstar Rowan Atkinson brings his Bean character to the bigscreen in a screwball comedy about his antics as a (dis)reputed art expert. Peter MacNicol and Harris Yulin (both "Ghostbusters II") and Burt Reynolds co-star. Mel Smith ("The Tall Guy") directs; Richard Curtis and Rowan Atkinson (both also "The Tall Guy") script with Robin Driscoll; "French Kiss" duo Tim Bevan and Eric Fellner produce for their Working Title with Peter Bennett-Jones. (Gramercy, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: Our 3 1/2-star review (Sept. issue) calls "Bean" "an incredibly entertaining piece of comic mayhem." Although what plays there doesn't necessarily play here, "Bean" has been a boxoffice smash in various overseas territories. U.S. fans of his TV series (shown on PBS) are likely 'goers; to pull wider, stage a Bean or Whistler's Mother lookalike contest—or go for media attention with a charity Whistler's Mother dunking throw.

Critical Care

In this satire, Albert Brooks ("Mother") stars as a highly respected surgeon who becomes disillusioned with modern medicine, starts drinking and finds himself at odds with a young idealistic doctor (James Spader) who must decide the fate of a comatose man, whose daughters are fighting over whether to pull the plug. Kyra Sedgwick, Helen Mirren and Anne Bancroft co-star. Sidney Lumet ("Night Falls On Manhattan") directs; producer Steven Schwartz adapts a novel by Richard Dooling. (Live, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: New distributor Live, which had advanced this to October, returns it to November; for audiences looking for lighter fare, this and the ultra-light "Bean" are the date's two wide-release choices. The cast is promising and should attract audience interest; given Lumet's recent track record—his four films in the '90s have averaged only a $14 million gross—highlight the Spader and Brooks names and this release's audience-friendly comedic underpinnings.

Eve's Bayou

In this drama, a 10-year-old girl tells the tale of her eccentric Louisiana clan. Samuel L. Jackson ("A Time to Kill") and Lynn Whitfield ("A Thin Line Between Love and Hate") star. Actress Kasi Lemmons ("Fear of a Black Hat") directs and scripts; Jackson produces with Caldecot Chubb ("The Crow"). (Trimark, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: After "Meet Wally Sparks" and "Chairman of the Board" now (if irresolutely) a wide-release player, Trimark continues to handle specialized fare, and this one—which opened 10/24 NY/LA—counterprograms the date's other offerings. Expect Jackson and Whitfield to pull black auds, though an R rating (for sexuality and language) nixes family demos.

Boogie Nights

Set in the porn world's '70s heyday, this dark comedy follows a group of players hoping to revamp the industry. Mark Wahlberg ("Fear"), Julianne Moore, Burt Reynolds, Don Cheadle and William H. Macy star. Paul Thomas Anderson ("Hard 8") directs and scripts; Larry Gordon ("The Devil's Own") produces with John Lyons, Lloyd Levin and JoAnne Sellar. (New Line, 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: "Boogie Nights" (moved from early, then late, summer, and opened limited in mid-Oct.) could draw extra attention thanks to its sexy subject matter. But exhibitors desiring wide Baby Boomer support could hype the nostalgic '70s-era setting. The 11/7 date could be a tough one for this adult fare, with the high-profile "Mad City" and "Starship Troopers" having the limelight.

The Wings of the Dove

Adapted by Hossein Amini ("Jude") from Henry James' turn-of-the-century romantic novel and set in London and Venice, this latest from director Iain Softley ("BackBeat," "Hackers") tells the story of a young woman (Helena Bonham Carter) from a wealthy family who falls in love with a poor journalist ("Priest's" Linus Roache). To keep him and her social standing, she asks him to romance a dying American heiress ("The Spitfire Grill's" Alison Elliot). Unexpected consequences ensue for all. David Parfitt ("Mary Shelley's Frankenstein") and Stephen Evans ("Much Ado About Nothing") produce. (Miramax, 11/7 NY/LA)

Exploitips: The season's first key specialized title, this R-rater (for sexuality) has a good cast and producer team and a hip director (who's batting 1-for-2, though). Bookstore tie-ins will help draw the likely distaff crowd.

Hugo Pool

In this absurdist comedy, Alyssa Milano ("Fear") stars as Hugo, a pool cleaner with odd clients (the likes of Robert Downey Jr., Richard Lewis and Patrick Dempsey) and an odder family: Cathy Moriarty plays her chronic gambling mother and Malcolm McDowell portrays her lost-soul father. Sean Penn and Ann Magnuson also co-star. Robert Downey Sr. ("Putney Swope") directs, and he co-scripts with his late wife Laura Downey; Barbara Ligeti ("Motorama") produces. (Northern Arts, 11/7 NY, 11/14 LA)

Exploitips: Once on the First Look slate but now breaststroked over to Northern Arts, "Hugo Pool" is much different in sensibility than the date's big specialized release, "The Wings of the Dove." So sell the contemporary angle to maximize somewhat younger turnout ("Hugo Pool" is rated R for language and sex-related material), who could prefer this to the Miramax period piece.

Mad City

When he's laid off, a museum staffer (John Travolta) snaps, accidentally shoots a guard and then takes patrons hostage. A tabloid reporter (Dustin Hoffman) decides to exploit the situation. Alan Alda, Mia Kirshner ("Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina") and Blythe Danner co-star. Constantin Costa-Gavras ("Music Box") directs; Tom Matthews (former BOXOFFICE managing editor) and Ebbe Roe Smith ("Falling Down") script; producing is the Kopelson duo, Arnold and Anne ("The Devil's Advocate," "Eraser"). (Warner Bros., 11/7 wide)

Exploitips: This comes with an audience-friendly PG-13, even if Costa-Gavras is known for mature fare—and it's true that his name will lend this cineaste cachet. But the mainstream sell, of course, is the superstar teaming of Travolta and Hoffman. And that'll come in handy, with this film going up against another of the season's big guns—what TriStar hopes is its "Men In Black" of the fall, namely the R-rated "Starship Troopers" (see P. 30).

Sick

Subtitled "The Life and Death of Bob Flanagan, Supermasochist," this documentary reveals the personal and professional of late performance artist Bob Flanagan, whose disturbing routine involved self-torture. Kirby Dick directs. (CFP, 11/8 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Our two-star review calls this "a film that in no uncertain terms is for mature audiences only. It...depicts sexual acts that most will find appalling and intolerable, and this fact overshadows any enticing human element." Nonetheless, the film's graphic nature is a come-on, so hype it to build avant-garde buzz.

Other Voices, Other Rooms

This adaptation of the Truman Capote novel relates a young boy's odyssey of self-discovery after he learns his reclusive and invalid father's secrets. David Rocksavage directs and co-scripts. (Artistic License, 11/7 NY)

Exploitips: The adult stars ("Le Confessional's" Lothaire Bluteau and "Unforgiven's" Anna Thomson) aren't unknowns, but the real sell is the Capote name. Robert C. Stigwood executive produces.

The Knowledge of Healing

This documentary focuses on Tanzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama. Frank Reichley directs. (IN, 11/5 NY)

Exploitips: This is nicely timed to split the calendar between "Seven Years in Tibet," which TriStar opened in early October, and Buena Vista's upcoming "Kundun," slated for Christmas.

NOVEMBER 14

The Jackal

In this "The Day of the Jackal" variant, a ruthless killer (Bruce Willis) is on a global murder mission; an FBI agent (Sidney Poitier) and a Russian officer (Diane Venora) enlist an imprisoned IRA terrorist (Richard Gere) to stop him. Michael Caton-Jones ("Rob Roy") directs; Chuck Pfarrer ("Barb Wire") and Kevin Jarre ("The Devil's Own") script; the "Michael" duo of James Jacks and Sean Daniel produce. (Universal, 11/14)

Exploitips: The Willis/Gere teaming should draw both genders and even non-thriller fans; an R rating (for strong violence and language) will limit under-17 teens—who will likely be getting parents to help them reboard "Starship Troopers" anyway. Key competition: weekend #2 of the similar-demo "Mad City." Also, MGM's move of Gere's "Red Corner" from 11/26 to 10/31 now means "The Jackal" will be the second Gere film in two weeks.

The Man Who Knew Too Little

Aka "Watch That Man," this caper comedy tells the story of an American (Bill Murray) who attends a London interactive stage show that puts participants in the middle of crime-solving adventures. Without his knowledge, the Yank becomes embroiled in a real case of international espionage. Peter Gallagher ("To Gil-lian on Her 37th Birthday") and Joanne Whalley ("Trial by Jury") co-star for director Jon Amiel, with whom they worked on "Tune in Tomorrow" and "The Singing Detective," respectively. Robert Farrar adapts his novel; Jon Amiel produces with Mark Tarlov, Michael Nathanson and Arnon Milchan for New Regency. (Warner Bros., 11/14)

Exploitips: Amiel ("Copycat," "Sommersby") is adept at various genres; the question mark is whether the talented Murray, of "Ghostbusters" and "Groundhog Day" fame, can draw substantial audiences after "Kingpin" and "Larger Than Life." But the studio made perhaps the season's wisest move when it re-dated this film to 11/14; previously, the PG-rater (for language, innuendo, comic violence and sensuality) was set to suicide against Disney's "Flubber"; now, it will lose only girls and younger children to...

The Little Mermaid

The story of a beautiful young mermaid named Ariel, who longs to be human, and her handsome prince is told again in this reissue of the 1989 Disney animated film, based on a Hans Christian Andersen tale. Voices by Rene Auberjonois, Jodi Benson, Buddy Hackett, Kenneth Mars and Edie McClurg. John Musker and Ron Clements (the "Hercules" duo) direct and script; Musker produces with the late Howard Ashman. Alan Menken's score won an Oscar; the Ashman/Menken tune "Under the Sea" took a statuette also. (Buena Vista, 11/14)

Exploitips: Even though it was the first of the new Disney's big animation successes (it did $84 million), this G-rater is likely to have just one big weekend. Though non-Disney, with all the perils that portends, Fox's new "Anastasia" is directly targeted at young girls come 11/21—and then Disney trumps itself with "Flubber" the following week. One might still expect decent play through the holidays.

One Night Stand

The latest from Oscar-nom'd filmmaker Mike Figgis ("Leaving Las Vegas") is a romantic drama about a married man who has what he expects will be just a one-night stand with a married woman. Finding he's unable to forget her, though, he tries to rekindle the romance—with unexpected results. Wesley Snipes, Nastassja Kinski ("Fathers' Day"), Robert Downey Jr. (also in "Hugo Pool"), Kyle MacLachlan ("Showgirls") and Ming-Na Wen ("The Joy Luck Club") star. Figgis scripts (Joe Eszterhas originated the story), and Figgis produces with Annie Stewart and Ben Myron. (New Line, 11/14 700 runs)

Exploitips: Even in this era, the black/white romantic casting might put off regional audiences (the rating here is R for strong sexuality and language, and for drug content), so expect best results in larger cities—thus the limited opening—and with the distaff demo. Snipes has a following, and the Figgis name (thanks to the Academy and public attentions to "Leaving Las Vegas") could draw some mainstreamers.

Welcome to Sarajevo

Brit and Yank journalists, including a female producer ("Shallow Grave's" Kerry Fox), a novice reporter (Emily Lloyd) and a jaded writer (Woody Harrelson), cover the Bosnian war. For U.K. correspondent Michael Henderson (stage actor Stephen Dillane), it becomes personal when he, helped by an American aid worker (Marisa Tomei), decides to smuggle to safety a little orphan girl. Michael Winterbottom ("Jude") directs; Frank Cottrell Boyce scripts; Graham Broadbent and Damian Jones produce. See our Oct.-issue Sneak Preview. (Miramax, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In our 3 1/2-star review (July issue), our Cannes critic called this docudrama "a complex, deeply moving story ...an extraordinarily affecting, personal, and at times uplifting tale." Winterbottom's camera is candid: The film is rated R for brutal images/war atrocities and language. Expect the more mature arthouse audiences to favor this, given its world-news topicality, while the younger head to...

Slaves to the Underground

In this drama set against the slacker music scene of Seattle, a love affair between two all-girl rock group bandmates (Molly Gross and "Love Always'" Marisa Ryan) hits the skids when one of the gals runs into her former boyfriend (Jason Bortz) and their relationship reignites. Documentarian Kristine Peterson directs, and she produces with Bill Cody and Raquel Caballes Maxwell; Bill Cody scripts. (First Look, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In our 1 1/2-star review (April issue), our Women in Cinema/Seattle fest critic had a number of problems with "Slaves to the Underground"; still, on an arthouse-heavy weekend, this R-rater (for strong sexuality and language) could draw younger female and lesbian audiences.

The Tango Lesson

Filmmaker Sally Potter ("Orlando") recounts her romantic involvement with Argentine tango dancer Pablo Veron and her multicontinental efforts to make a film about the Latin dance. Christopher Sheppard (also "Orlando") produces. (Sony Classics, 11/14 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Potter's challenging "Orlando" grossed a good $7 million take in 1993, and highlighting that credit could draw arthouse audiences. Though "Orlando" would hardly have filled the bill, "The Tango Lesson"—rated a promotable PG (for brief language and some violent images)—might allow outreach to local art programs for exhibitors eager to take advantage of the film's age-friendly rating.

Nick and Jane

A successful female executive meets a male cab driver; love blossoms. But can it last? Dana Wheeler-Nicholson ("Denise Calls Up" and James McCaffrey ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs") star. Rich Mauro directs; he scripts with Neil Alumkal and Peter Quigley; Bill McCutchen III produces. (CFP/Avalanche, 11/14)

Exploitips: Our Santa Barbara critic (June '96 issue) gave this two stars; still, everyone loves a love story, so hype the genre. CFP moved this from 10/10, which one hopes is a sign of confidence; the 11/14 frame is chockful of specialized fare.

A Further Gesture

Playing a hard-luck Irishman, Stephen Rea ("Michael Collins") exits the Emerald Isle for New York City. There, fortune still doesn't smile on him, as he becomes involved in an assassination attempt. (Castle Hill, 11/14 ltd)

Exploitips: Given a certain popularity of Irish-themed films stateside, the Irish element and Rea's name are the sells. Expect the genre to favor male turnout.

Ill Gotten Gains

In 1869, after slavery's abolition, 24 captives in the hold of the slave ship "Argon Miss" experience the spirit in The Wood (voice of Eartha Kitt), prompting them to bloody uprising. This drama stars Djimon Hounsou (the upcoming "Amistad," which is based on the same historical incident), Akosua Busia ("Rosewood"), De'Aundre Bonds ("Get On the Bus") and Clabe Hartley. Joel Marsden directs, scripts and produces. (Spats Films, 11/14)

Exploitips: Perhaps feeling an understandable need to bow before "Amistad," Steven Spielberg's high-profile tale (which DreamWorks docks 12/12 limited and expands 12/25), production company Spats Films has determined to open on this date and could self-distribute. At press time, negotiations with several distributors were ongoing.

Anastasia

Meg Ryan voices the title character in this animated tale of Czarevna Anastasia (daughter of Russia's last Czar, Nicholas II), who might have escaped alive the killing of the royal family in 1917 during the Bolshevik Revolution. In this telling, a girl who remembers nothing of her heritage follows a clue to Paris in an attempt to find her identity; the evil Rasputin pursues her, and a charming conman befriends her. Kelsey

Grammer, Angela Lansbury, John Cusack and Christopher Lloyd provide other voices. Don Bluth and Gary Goldman, the team for "An American Tail" and "All Dogs Go to Heaven," direct and produce; Eric Tuchman, Susan Gauthier and Bruce Graham script. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (Fox, 11/21 wide)

Exploitips: Like DreamWorks, Fox is going heavy into animation—even as recent Disney animated fare has been struggling to reach the once-easy $100 million mark. This $50+ million effort is the studio's first out of its new Arizona facility, and although it's likely to pull the family demo in general it trends toward the little-girl side in particular—the same group that Disney satisfied just last weekend with its "The Little Mermaid" reissue. Yet the advantage seems "Anastasia's," given that it's a new entry opening for the Thanksgiving school break.

The Rainmaker

Adapted from John Grisham's 1995 best-seller, this David and Goliath tale follows the struggles of a recent law-school graduate ("Courage Under Fire's" Matt Damon) pitted against an unscrupulous insurance industry giant and a big-name law firm. Claire Danes ("William Shakespeare's Romeo & Juliet"), Danny DeVito, Jon Voight ("Most Wanted"), Danny Glover (also in "Switchback"), Virginia Madsen ("Ghosts of Mississippi") and Mickey Rourke co-star. Francis Ford Coppola directs and scripts; Michael Douglas and Steven Reuther produce for Douglas/Reuther Prods. with American Zoetrope. See our October issue's Cover Story. (Paramount, 11/21)

Exploitips: This is the seventh Grisham-based film in just five years, and the last ("The Chamber") was received coolly. Given "A Time to Kill's" response, though, that might have been an aberration, not a sign of audience overdose. Some expect Damon to be the next McConaughey (who leaped to fame with "A Time to Kill"), and the supporting cast here is solid. And, of course, there's that Coppola name.

Mortal Kombat: Annihilation

A group of courageous warriors must survive new challenges when they do battle with an evil warlord who wants to rule Earth. Christopher Lambert, Robin Shou and Talisa Soto return for the sequel; supermodel Irina Pantaeva co-stars. John Leonetti ("Child's Play 3") directs; Brent V. Friedman ("Hellbound") scripts with Bryce Zable; Larry Kasanoff produces. (New Line, 11/21 wide)

Exploitips: "Mortal Kombat," directed by Paul Anderson, generated $70.4 million in summer '95. This second iteration, originally skedded for August (when New Line successfully birthed "Spawn"), should draw the same arcade/videogame aficionados at the malls on Thanksgiving break.

Oscar & Lucinda

Sharing love, guilt and a passion for gambling, a British priest ("The English Patient's" Ralph Fiennes) and an Australian glassworks heiress (Cate Blanchett) decide to toil together to transport a glass church by river to a remote Down Under parish. Gillian Armstrong ("Little Women") directs; Laura Jones ("High Tide") adapts Peter Carey's Booker Prize-winning novel; "Cosi's" Timothy White produces with Robin Dalton. (Fox Searchlight, 11/21)

Exploitips: The arthouse crowd was to have two key choices this weekend, but Gramercy's move of "The Matchmaker" to 10/3 leaves this R-rater (for sexuality and brief violence) with the arthouse weekend virtually to itself. (Unless this goes 11/14, vs. considerable competition.) The Armstrong and Aussie pedigrees will pull the "My Brilliant Career"/"Shine" types (at $13 mil. in production coinage, this is very expensive Down Under fare), but the best bet for broadening the audience is to highlight Fiennes' presence, last onscreen exactly a year ago with the hit "The English Patient."

Liar

In this psychological thriller, a Charleston blueblood ("Hoodlum's" Tim Roth) who might have killed a hooker ("Jerry Maguire's" Renee Zellweger) uses his brilliance to play mental games with two detectives ("Mulholland Falls'" Chris Penn and "Trigger Effect's" Michael Rooker). Ellen Burstyn and Rosanna Arquette co-star. Jonas and Josh Pate direct and script; Peter Glatzer produces for MDP. (MGM, 11/21 ltd)

Exploitips: An acquisition to fill out the Lion's slate, "Liar" (a tentative title) faces no new genre competition on its limited rollout, though it will have to battle hold-over business for the higher-wattage "The Jackal." As leads, the players here are more arthouse names, so expect a specialized level of turnout. Some extra media attention is likely given the fact that the directors are twins.

Alien Resurrection

Sigourney Weaver as Ripley again battles malevolent extraterrestrials in this fourth installment of the "Alien" franchise. This time out, evil scientists clone our hero to access the alien queen that died inside her body when Ripley suicided in "Alien^3." Winona Ryder co-stars with Dan Hedaya, Brad Dourif and two from "The City of Lost Children," Ron Perlman and Dominique Pinon. Jean-Pierre Jeunet (also "The City of Lost Children") directs; Joss Whedon ("Toy Story") scripts; David Giler, Walter Hill, Gordon Carroll and Bill Badalato produce. (Fox, 11/26)

Exploitips: Fox goes for the gusto in its directing choices for this franchise. Though the artfully dark vision of David Fincher (who went on to make "Seven") of 1992's "Alien^3" didn't find wide audience support, the studio (after winning and then losing "Shallow Grave's" Danny Boyle) for this iteration went with Jeunet, whose offkilter vision (with co-director Marc Caro) drew foreign-language fans to "The City of Lost Children" and "Delicatessen." Will the arthouse aficionado fare well on the megaplex screen? That this is one of only two sequels this month should help; even as "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation" draws younger, this R-rater (for strong sci-fi violence and gore, some grotesque images and language) should trend older.

Bent

Based on the stage play of the same name, "Bent" is an unconventional wartime love story that brings Nazi persecution of homosexuals into the spotlight. A suave, debonair playboy, Max (Clive Owen of "The Rich Man's Wife"), is living the decadent Berlin nightlife when Hitler's reign of terror begins. Max finds himself on the run from the SS and denying his identity—until he meets a similarly imperiled man, Horst (Lothaire Bluteau, also in "Other Voices, Other Rooms"). Ian McKellen ("Richard III"), Brian Webber and Mick Jagger co-star. Sean Mathias directs; Martin Sherman scripts; Michael Solinger and Dixie Linder produce. (Goldwyn/MGM, 11/26 ltd)

Exploitips: This will draw crossover interest from generic arthouse patrons, but "Bent's" gay theme make it a natural for that specialized demo. To accentuate crossover, highlight the WWII setting; keep in mind that MGM's UA label release of "Richard III," a 12/95 opener, maxed at $2.6 million domestic.

Never Met Picasso

In this whimsical dramatic comedy, an artist ("Wigstock: The Movie's" Alexis Arquette) who hasn't quite left the safety of home finds himself a member of a whole new Lost Generation. Meanwhile, Mom (Margot Kidder, best known for her "Superman" turn as Lois Lane) is seduced by her son's lesbian sculptor friend. Among the bohemian characters are the son's unstable beau ("Exotica's" Don McKellar) and an older gay

FLUBBER

Robin Williams takes on the Fred MacMurray role in this remake of the 1961 family comedy "The Absent-Minded Professor." Williams plays a scientist who invents Flubber (a rubbery anti-gravity substance); Christopher MacDonald ("The Rich Man's Wife") plays the prof's nemesis who tries to purloin the putty. Marcia Gay Harden ("The First Wives Club") plays the prof's long-suffering fiancee, now updated to college president, and there's a flying robot assistant named WEEBO. Les Mayfield ("Encino Man") directs; John Hughes scripts, and he produces with former Hollywood Pictures head Ricardo Mestres. (Buena Vista, 11/26)

Exploitips: Four years (and two days) ago, Williams and Hughes protege Chris Columbus launched the family comedy "Mrs. Doubtfire" to Thanksgiving-through-New Year success and a very domestic $220 million. Clearly, Disney hopes for that kind of number, vs. that for its previous Williams starrer, the 8/96 "Jack" ($59 million). The chances? Especially given its predictable PG rating (for slapstick action and mild language), not bad. Expect "Alien Resurrection" and "Red Corner" to draw the non-competing SF and adult demos; whatever competition the same-genre "The Man Who Knew Too Little" would have given "Flubber" has disappeared with Warner's move of it to the Nov. 14 frame.

uncle. Georgia Ragsdale co-stars. Stephen Kijak directs, scripts and produces. (Turbulent Arts, 11/28)

Exploitips: Expect strongest turnout from twentysomethings who can relate and from gay and lesbian auds. Some crossover might be generated via a gotta-see-this response to the Kidder presence, first for her change-of-pace role and second for her comeback from much-publicized physical and mental difficulties.

NOV. UNDATED

Body Count

In a "Jade" reteaming, Linda Fiorentino and David Caruso star in this film about an art heist gone wrong. Ving Rhames ("Rosewood"), Forest Whitaker ("Species"), John Leguizamo ("The Pest") and Donnie Wahlberg ("Ransom") co-star. Robert Patton Spruill ("The Squeeze") directs. (Gramercy, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Unlike the similar-genre "Kiss or Kill" (see below), this has salable stateside star wattage, so expect some turnout from mainstreamers willing to venture into an arthouse hall. The genre and rating (R for strong violence and pervasive strong language) could also help pull males.

Kiss or Kill

Down Under helmer Bill Bennett ("Two If By Sea") directs "Love and Other Catastrophes'" Frances O'Connor and Matt Day in this dramatic thriller about a grifter couple running from police across Australia's Nullarbor Desert. When a series of murders occur along their route, each suspects the other. Bennett also scripts and produces. (October Films, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Especially given its lack of known names, emphasize the Aussie heritage of this arthouse entry to attract fans of Down Under fare. And—as with Gramercy's "Body Count"—highlight the genre to help draw males into your theatre queue.

The Leading Man

In this drama set amid London's theatre world, a playwright (Lambert Wilson) sleeping with his leading lady ("The Journey of August King's" Thandie Newton) asks his leading man ("Moonlight & Valentino's" Jon Bon Jovi) to sleep with his angry Italian wife ("The Hairdresser's Husband's" Anna Galiena)—with results that he had not intended. John Duigan (also "The Journey of August King") directs; Virginia Duigan scripts; Bertil Ohlsson and Paul Raphael produce. (Legacy, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Screened at the 1996 Toronto fest, "The Leading Man" won a three-star review from our critic, who said that the film is "fresh and unpredictable" and that rocker-turned-actor Bon Jovi in "the Sting role" has "genuine presence and charm." The Duigan and Newton names are known to and respected by the arthouse crowd, and a growing buzz about Bon Jovi's abilities and his continued MTV-audience popularity could rein youths.

Tokyo Fist

In this sweaty and kinetic Japanese-language new-wave action movie, a corporate executive ("Tetsuo: The Ironman" filmmaker Shinya Tsukamoto, who also directs here) is unhappy to meet up with an old school friend (Kohji Tsukamoto), now a boxer. Their competitive jealousies increase when the exec's fiancee (Kahora Fujii) decides to move in with the pugilist. (Island Digital Media, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Not only did this move from October, but its distributor's name changed, from Manga—in part because the house was beginning to handle non-manga fare, and to show the label's Island corporate parentage. Quotably, Tsukamoto has been called "the Asian answer to William Gibson, William Burroughs, David Cronenberg and David Lynch," and "Tokyo Fist" has been described as "an assault and battery of a movie."

Withnail & I

This re-release of the 1987 British comedy follows the misadventures of two self-absorbed and unemployed actors who endure a disastrous vacation in the English countryside. Richard E. Grant, Paul McGann and Richard Griffiths star. Bruce Robinson directs. (Northern Arts, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Emphasize the film's 10-year anniversary to lend this event status. Northern Arts moved this from September, perhaps wisely, given that month's overload (38 titles, per our October-issue Independent Feature Chart) versus that of November.

Parallel Sons

An unlikely bond grows between a rural white teenager (Gabriel Mick) and an escaped urban-black convict (Laurence Mason). Murphy Guyer, Graham Alex Johnson, Heather Gottlieb and Josh Hopkins co-star. John G. Young directs and scripts; James Spione and Nancy Larson produce. (Greycat, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: A much-moved film (Cinevista first planned a March '96 bow, then Greycat acquired it and targeted June and then November of last year, and then October of this year), "Parallel Sons" might be most effectively marketed to gay audiences through alternative media.

Bollywood Cinema Series

Mani Ratnam's romantic "Roja" ("The Rose"), Sanjay Leela Bhansail's musical "Khamoshi" ("Silence"), Harry Baweja's "Romeo and Juliet" variant "Diljale" ("Heartbreak"), Shankar's politically campy "Hindustani" and Ashok Honda's biofilm "Rakshak" ("The Defender") travel as a sort of Indian film fest. (Phaedra, Nov. undated)

Exploitips: Phaedra head Greg Hatanaka says that all five titles will be bookable to play during a one- to two-week period all together; individual titles that have drawn audience and press praise will then be made available for return solo engagements. His hope is that this strategy will build enough interest in this Indian fare to allow longer runs.

DECEMBER 5

Office Killer

In this black-comic horror film, Carol Kane ("The Princess Bride") stars as a mousy murderer prowling a magazine company's halls after her boss-from-hell, a career-obsessed assistant and a paranoid colleague. Molly Ringwald, Jeanne Tripplehorn and Barbara Sukowa co-star. Photographer/artist Cindy Sherman makes her directing debut; Tom Kalin scripts; Christine Vachon produces for Good Machine's horror/art label, Good Fear. (Strand, 12/3 NY, 12/5 LA, 12/12 SF)

Exploitips: Originally slated to go out via Miramax on (this is Miramax all over) Secretary's Day, "Office Killer" now punches in for Strand. Expect at least a modicum of gleanable press cites from the film's Toronto fest appearance, and play up the seasonal counterprogramming with a comic catchline like: "Not feeling festive at work? Here's one way to celebrate: murder."

The Mother and the Whore

This reissue of the controversial 3 1/2-hour French film (winner at the '73 Cannes of a special grand jury prize and the international critics prize) explores the relationships among three children raised in the '60s counterculture who are both the heroes and victims of sexual liberation. Bernadette Lafont, Jean-Pierre Leaud and Francoise Lebrun star. Jean Eustache directs. (Artificial Eye, 12/2 NY)

Exploitips: Highlight the 25th anniversary angle with a catchline like "the film that inflamed audiences 25 years ago returns." For serious arthousers, the film's French-language nature is a plus.

Amistad

Steven Speilberg, in his first serious film since "Schindler's List," tackles issues of slavery and justice in this drama based on a true story. In summer 1839, 53 African captives led by Cinque (Djimon Hounsou, also in the similar "Ill Gotten Gains") take over the slave ship Amistad but, failing in their attempt to sail home, are forced to confront the American justice system. Abolitionist Theodore Joadson ("Kiss the Girls'" Morgan Freeman) and young lawyer Roger Baldwin ("A Time to Kill's" Matthew McConaughey) ready a defense, but President Martin Van Buren ("Twelfth Night's" Nigel Hawthorne) wants to appease the pro-slavery South. Anthony Hopkins,

Pete Postlethwaite, David Paymer and Stellan Skarsgaard ("Breaking the Waves") co-star. David Franzoni and Steven Zaillian (also "Schindler's List") script; Spielberg, Debbie Allen and Colin Wilson produce. See this issue's Sneak Preview. (DreamWorks, 12/12 ltd, 12/25 exp)

Exploitips: This looks to be a solid performer, just as a dozen years ago Spielberg's "The Color Purple" pulled. Although the storyline here might not be as mainstream-wide as is other upcoming Christmas fare, "Amistad" is likely to generate great press attention, thus cranking up audience interest. A dynamic cast could also help word of mouth travel inward from the coasts as the film nears its Christmas Day expansion. Expect the Spielberg name to free up boxoffice gold.

Senseless

In this Penelope Spheeris ("The Little Rascals") comedy, a cash-starved college student ("The 6th Man's" Marlon Wayans) works four jobs but still can't pay his bills. He agrees to participate in a university medical experiment that is supposed to heighten his senses, which it does—until he starts to experience bouts when he completely lacks one of his senses, leading to comically embarrassing events. David Spade and Rip Torn co-star. David Hoberman and Eric L. Gold produce. (Miramax, 12/12 wide)

Exploitips: This is likely to pull in urban auds wanting lighter fare than "Amistad" (and none too interested in New York angst; see next item), and it should draw well from the suburban twenty-something and on-Christmas-break ivy-campus crowds. So highlight Spheeris' "Wayne's World" credit, even if a bit dated.

Deconstructing Harry

In this latest Woody Allen self-reflexive comedy, Allen plays a writer whose life is an erratic series of very nervous romances. Kirstie Alley, Richard Benjamin, Billy Crystal, Judy Davis ("Husbands and Wives"), Mariel Hemingway ("Manhattan"), Amy Irving, Julie Kavner ("Shadows and Fog"), Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Demi Moore, Elisabeth Shue, Stanley Tucci and Robin Williams star. Allen directs and scripts; Jean Doumanian produces. (Fine Line, 12/12 NY/LA/Tor)

Exploitips: Although Miramax handled Allen's last three films, Fine Line acquired North American rights to this at Cannes (with part of the $10.5 million pact being that the distributor would release Barbara Kopple's documentary about Allen's jazz band's European tour). In the '90s, Allen's seven films have averaged just $8.75 million domestically, but Fine Line is likely to toil extra hard for success here.

Mr. Magoo

In this Walt Disney effort, nearsighted millionaire Quincy Magoo ("Spy Hard's" Leslie Neilsen) has a stolen gem land in his possession. Targeted by bad guys who want it back, the bumbling Magoo—just like in the cartoons that Jim Backus memorably voiced—consistently escapes dangerous treacheries unharmed and oblivious. Added to the mix are a nephew, Waldo, and a bulldog, Angus. Kelly Lynch, Ernie Hudson and Malcolm McDowell co-star. Stanley Tong (the Hong Kong helmer noted for such Jackie Chan fare as "Rumble in the Bronx") directs; Pat Proft and Tom Sherohman script; Ben Myron ("One Night Stand") produces. See our July '97 issue Sneak Preview. (Buena Vista, 12/19)

Exploitips: Already shellacked by conservative and religious groups for certain of its non-children's film fare and for its gay-partner employee policy, Disney has taken new heat from the National Federation for the Blind for what the group sees as a ridiculing of the blind inherent in the Magoo character. Disney's response—that Magoo is nearsighted, not blind—didn't seem to help matters much. Controversy can help a film like "The Crying Game," but it's rarely a boon for a family film. Then again, it might simply not matter; animal groups fearing a wave of unwise pet adoptions protested "101 Dalmatians," and that made $136 million domestic. Nonetheless, antics-full sell techniques by exhibitors might be unwise here.

Home Alone 3

This third installment of the John Hughes child-caper comedy series that made a star out of Macaulay Culkin returns with a new eight-year-old. Alex D. Linz ("One Fine Day") stars as Alex Pruitt, who—left home alone with the chicken pox by mom (Haviland Morris)—finds himself facing off with international thieves looking for top-secret defense plans that have been hidden inside the mechanical components of a toy car. Olek Krupa, Rya Kihlstedt, David Thorton and Lenny Von Dohlen play the clumsy but deadly foreign thieves. Kevin Kilner, Seth Smith and Scarlett Johansson (also in "The Horse Whisperer") co-star; Raja Gosnell (who edited both "Home Alone" efforts) makes his directorial debut; Hughes again scripts, and he produces with Ricardo Mestres. (Fox, 12/19)

Exploitips: At one time, this was tentatively a summer title, despite the holiday success of the first two iterations. The wholesale switchout of cast—not only is Culkin gone, but so are Catherine O'Hara and John Heard as the forgetful parents and Joe Pesci and Daniel Stern as the bumbling bad guys—might have been necessary in creative terms (witness recent non-response to "Free Willy 3") but in audience terms could be a turnoff (just as successful movies made into TV series must surmount loyalty-based audience antipathy). Also, this one gets a comparatively late start: "Home Alone" bowed 11/16/90, winning $282 million domestically, and the sequel opened 11/20/92, finishing with $173 million. Still, in this "we're-going-to-the-movies" season, the real battle is vs. "Mr. Magoo," and parents might decide this PG fare (for slapstick violence, language and mild sensuality) is more family-ish.

The Mighty

In this imaginative comedy/drama, two outcast boys—Maxwell Kane, a giant, slow-witted boy, and Kevin, a tiny, sickly but super-intelligent child—team up to face fights with local hoods and also adventures both mythical and real. Sharon Stone, Kieran Culkin, Gillian Anderson (TV's "The X-Files"), Harry Dean Stanton and Gena Rowlands co-star. Peter Chelsom (the success d'estime "Funny Bones") directs; Charles Leavitt ("Sunchaser") and Rodman Philbrick adapt Philbrick's novel; Simon Fields and Jane Startz produce. (Miramax, 12/19 NY/LA, 1/16/98 wide)

Exploitips: One critic called "Funny Bones" "extraordinarily strange," and this one sounds not all that ordinary also. From the days of its disastrous launch of 1993's "Into the West," Miramax has wanted to establish a family label; even more than with Miramax's recent "Wide Awake," the question here seems to be whether it wants to pull children to stories about children or adults to stories about children.

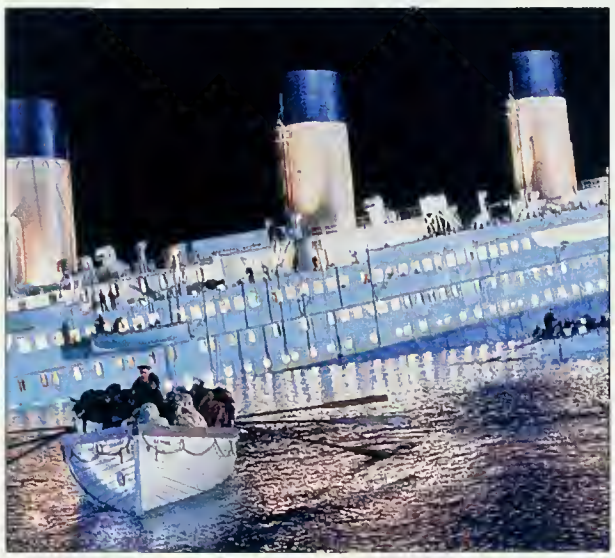
The Winter Guest



British actor Alan Rickman ("Michael Collins") makes his directing debut with this drama about a strong-willed mother ("Sense and Sensibility's" Phyllida Law) who arrives bringing unsolicited advice, opinions and emotion into the Scottish seaside home of her recently widowed daughter (Emma Thompson, Law's "Sense and Sensibility" co-star and also her real-life daughter) on a day so cold the sea has frozen. Rickman and Sharman Macdonald adapt Macdonald's play; Ed Pressman, Ken Lipper and Steve Clark-Hall produce. (Fine Line, 12/19 NY/LA/Tor)

Exploitips: Screened at Montreal, this won a 3 1/2-star review from our critic and is likely to build a cache of arthouse-oriented praise before opening. Despite Thompson's wide appeal and Rickman's fame as the original "Die Hard" bad guy, "The Winter Guest" is resolutely specialized fare; although its opening-date competition is "The Mighty," given its dramatics it will also do battle through the holidays with other arthouse fare (like "The Sweet Hereafter," also from Fine Line) but also serious studio efforts like "Kundun" and "The Boxer." One might forecast split votes, although the Thompson name should certainly help.

Will It Snow for Christmas?

This French-language drama follows the lives of a mother and her seven illegitimate children growing up on a farm in southern France, where their poor but happy lives are intermittently interrupted by their unpredictable, tyrannical father. Dominique Reymond and Daniel Duval star. Sandrine Veysset scripts and makes her directing debut; Humbert Balsan ("The Proprietor") produces. (Zeitgeist, 12/17 NY)

Exploitips: A seasonal tie-in by title or storyline is never a bad thing, though it's probably more helpful on a studio title like a "Home Alone" than for an arthouse entry. As always, if it's foreign-language, that it's the French language being spoken is a plus.

Writer/director James Cameron ("True Lies") recreates the ill-fated 1912 maiden voyage of the luxury liner Titanic in this epic adventure/romance. Using historical and fictional characters, this joint-studio production (Paramount has domestic distribution rights, Fox has foreign) follows the onboard love story between the aristocratic Rose ("Sense and Sensibility's" Kate Winslet) and steerage passenger Jack (Leonardo DiCaprio of "Romeo & Juliet"). Billy Zane ("The Phantom"), Kathy Bates ("Dolores Claiborne"), Frances Fisher ("Female Perversions"), Bernard Hill, Jonathan Hyde, Danny Nucci, David Warner and Bill Paxton ("Twister") co-star. Cameron and Jon Landau produce for Lightstorm. (Paramount, 12/19)

Exploitips: Our advice, back when this was a 7/2 release, was that exhibitors already blessed with "Men In Black" should play up the romance of the DiCaprio/Winslet pairing with a catchline like "a voyage into love—and legend." Now what was "MIB" has become "Tomorrow Never Dies," and our advice remains the same. Admittedly, it'll take quite a romance to make "Titanic's" maybe $200 million cost worthwhile, but that's a studio worry; exhibitors need only fill their theatres for this to work for them. Early buzz on the Internet from a midwestern work-in-progress sneak was quite good, citing a mix of adventure and romance that could work for both genders.

TOMORROW NEVER DIES

James Bond is back for the 18th installment of the longest-running franchise in film history. Pierce Brosnan returns as Agent 007 in this action/adventure; this time out, the debonair secret agent takes on a dangerously powerful media mogul ("Carrington's" Jonathan Pryce) and crosses paths with, of course, two beautiful women: Teri Hatcher ("Heaven's Prisoners") plays the media mogul's wife who shares a secret past with Bond, and "Supercop's" Michelle Yeoh plays an Asian agent who becomes a formidable ally to 007. Roger Spottiswoode ("Air America") directs; Bruce Feirstein scripts; Michael G. Wilson and Barbara Broccoli again produce the Broccoli/Eon production. See this issue's Cover Story. (UA, 12/19)

Exploitips: When MGM's fall-season press kit is opened, a microchip plays the Bond theme—signaling just how important this UA title is to the Lion, which announced in September it was going public. Exhibitors can expect a full-court press to get "Tomorrow Never Dies" booked into a majority of prime theatres, "Titanic" or no, but exhibitors can also expect a full-court press via the adwoves to position this as the film to see as Christmas vacation opens. It's likely, in this megaplex era, that both films will be able to boast of smashing opening-weekend numbers, and each—unless word of mouth is bad—can expect to be a major force right through the New Year.

The Horse Whisperer

Robert Redford directs and stars in this drama/romance, an adaptation of the best-selling novel by Nicholas Evans. When a girl (Scarlett Johansson, also in "Home Alone 3") and her prized horse are terribly wounded in a riding accident, her sophisticated mother ("The English Patient's" Kristin Scott Thomas), seeing that the fate of her daughter rests on the animal's recovery, seeks out the help of a "horse whisperer" (Redford), a rural man with a gift for curing troubled horses. Love blossoms between the man and woman. Sam Neill, Dianne Wiest and Chris Cooper co-star. Eric Roth ("Forrest Gump") and Richard LaGravenese ("A Little Princess") script; Redford produces with Patrick Markey. See photo, P. 30. (Buena Vista, 12/25 wide)

Exploitips: Especially given the project's strong distaff leaning, this is likely to be the bookstore tie-in of the season. Scott Thomas' "The English Patient" credit should help further. And one can see why the Montanan Redford would be drawn to this project, although it was seven years ago when many questioned the believability of Redford as a romantic lead opposite Lena Olin in Christmas 1990's "Havana."

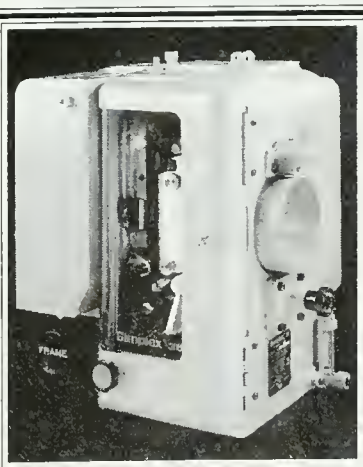
The Postman

Kevin Costner moves behind the camera for the first time since



"Dances With Wolves" with this futuristic adventure set in a ruined American West, where the nation's infrastructure lies in shambles. In this milieu, one isolated township dreams of making contact with other struggling settlements, despite the divisive grip of a general ("Inventing the Abbotts'" Will Patton) and his army. When a stranger (Costner), who's posing as a postman simply to get a meal and a place to stay, arrives in the town, his presence brings hope, inspiring the townspeople to fight back against the general and forcing The Postman to decide whether to stay and fight or to abandon his new identity. Larenz Tate ("love jones") and newcomer Olivia Williams co-star. Eric Roth (also "The Horse Whisperer") and Brian Helgeland ("L.A. Confidential") adapt David Brin's novel; Costner produces with longtime partner Jim Wilson and Steve Tisch. (Warner Bros., 12/25)

Exploitips: Audiences will recall the Oscar-draped "Dances With Wolves" with pleasure; on the other hand, "The Postman's" dystopian future setting could conjure images of "Waterworld," which is remembered as a colossal failure, fairly or not. Given Costner's mature approach to filmmaking, likely competition will be Redford's "The Horse Whisperer"; Scorsese's "Kundun"; Jim Sheridan's "The Boxer," though that remains limited until 1/9/98; and Clint Eastwood's "Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil." The Christmas season obviously expands the available moviegoing audience greatly, but it's unlikely all five will be blockbusters; going in, the popularity of the Costner name, like that of Redford and Eastwood, could give this an edge over the more cineaste-leaning Scorsese and Sheridan.

Jackie Brown

This latest from Quentin Tarantino, based on the crime caper novel "Rum Punch" by Elmore Leonard, follows the adventures of smuggling stewardess Jackie Brown ('70s blaxploitation film star Pam Grier), who is busted by federal agents and forced to set up a sting operation to bring in a half-million dollars and bring down a gun runner; she, of course, has other plans. Samuel L. Jackson (also in "Eve's Bayou"), Robert Forster, Bridget Fonda, Michael Keaton and Robert De Niro co-star. Tarantino directs and scripts; Lawrence Bender (another "Pulp Fiction"-eer, as well as overseer of this month's "Good Will Hunting") produces. See the Sneak Preview in this issue. (Miramax, 12/25 wide)

Exploitips: On the one hand, there're the likes of Scorsese and Sheridan; on the other, there's pop filmmaker extraordinaire Tarantino. "Jackie Brown" isn't as star-heavy (and thus mainstream-pulling) as "Pulp Fiction" (for one thing, Grier never had the worldwide fame of Travolta to lose and regain), and "Pulp Fiction" bowed more than three years ago on a 10/14/94 date on which its competitors were offering only the likes of "Exit to Eden" and "Little Giants." Will this, like Tarantino's previous, crack $100 million? Expect strong media attention and larger-market audience interest on weekend #1; the rest is up to Tarantino.

As Good As It Gets

An unlikely bond forms among three New York neighbors that don't appear to have anything in common: an old, curmudgeonly romance novelist (Jack Nicholson), a cafe waitress juggling the responsibilities of single parenthood ("Twister's" Helen Hunt) and a gay artist whose career is at a crossroads ("A Smile Like Yours'" Greg Kinnear). All are brought together by a dog named Verdell in this comedy (aka "Old Friends") from filmmaker James L. Brooks. Cuba Gooding Jr. ("Jerry Maguire"), Skeet Ulrich ("Scream") and Shirley Knight co-star. Brooks directs, and he also scripts with Mark Andrus and produces with Kristi Zea and Bridget Johnson. (TriStar, 12/25)

Exploitips: Even more than the Brooks imprimatur, it's the diverse casting here that promises diverse demo pull. (Nicholson, Hunt and Gooding: Now that's a picture.) The fact that this is much lighter fare than that coming from Brooks' esteemed fellows like Costner and Scorsese, yet still comes from a significant filmmaker, also singles this one out. Expect "For Richer or Poorer" and "Mousehunt" to provide some competition, although the former could skew to particularly undemanding audiences and the latter lacks major-star firepower.

For Richer or Poorer

Tim Allen and Kirstie Alley star in this romantic comedy about a high-living, unhappily married couple who find themselves owing the IRS millions in back taxes when their accountant rips them off and disappears. A wrong turn on the way out of the country lands them in Amish country, where they hide out by posing as long-lost relatives. As the sophisticated couple adjusts to their new lifestyle, they rediscover their love for each other. Larry Miller co-stars. Bryan Spicer ("McHale's Navy") directs; Jana Howington and Steven LuKanic script; Sid, Jon and Bill Sheinberg produce for their Bubble Factory house. (Universal, 12/25)

Exploitips: All the Bubble Factory efforts ("Flipper," "The Pest," "McHale's Navy," "A Simple Wish") have performed so poorly that Universal ended its production pact with Bubble, despite Sid Sheinberg's previous two decades at the MCA helm. Although Bubble Factory might now have the same negative connotation with exhibitors that Savoy once built up, Tim Allen and Kirstie Alley have significant mainstream pull that none of the Bubble-production stars have before. Those audiences aren't going to know a Bubble from a Balloon, and what they like more than anything is a they-live-happily-ever-after romantic comedy.

Mousehunt

Two down-on-their-luck brothers, Ernie ("The Birdcage's" Nathan Lane) and Lars (Lee Evans), are surprised to learn the old mansion they have inherited is worth millions. Before they can cash in, however, they must rid the house of a tenacious mouse—a stubborn creature who has no intention of vacating the premises. Maury Chaykin and Christopher Walken co-star. Gore Verbinski directs; Adam Rifkin ("The Chase") scripts; Alan Riche, Tony Ludwig and Bruce Cohen produce. (DreamWorks, 12/25)

Exploitips: This first comedy from DreamWorks, aside from its SKG moniker, has only Lane's "Birdcage" credit to flaunt. One should be able to expect a dreamy DreamWorks push, although the company's attention might quite understandably be weighted toward taking care of its same-day expansion of its co-founder's "Amistad." Key competition is likely to come from TriStar's higher-profile "As Good As It Gets"; "Mousehunt" might need to not so quietly hunt for good word-of-mouth to give it a better shot come weekend #2.

Kundun

In 1937, a two-year-old boy from a peasant Tibetan family is recognized as the 14th reincarnation of the Buddha of love and compassion; he is destined as the new Dalai Lama to become his country's spiritual and political leader. Directed by Martin Scorsese, this drama recounts the Tibetan's life from childhood through the 1950 Chinese invasion and the crushed rebellion at decade's end and on into his time in exile. Tenzin Thuthob Tsarong, Kunga J. Tenzin and Tenzin Gyalpo star. Melissa Mathison (best known for "E.T.") scripts; Barbara De Fina (Scorsese's "Casino") produces. (Buena Vista, 12/25 ltd)

Exploitips: The $35 million "Kundun," originally a Universal turnaround project, has been a cultural and political headache for Disney Co., which has been trying to open the vast Chinese marketplace to sell its many product lines. Although UGC was sold all "Kundun" distribution rights except for the North American and United Kingdom markets, China—a country in which many Disney toys also are made—still IDs this as Disney Co. fare. The now-departed Michael Ovitz was able to woo Scorsese (whom Ovitz agented while at CAA) from his longtime MCA home into a two-picture deal at the Mouse House by backing his "Kundun." But—unless this delivers a good-hearted emotional wallop (hardly the Scorsese signature) that transcends America's "Tenzin" resistance to stories of other cultures —this looks to be a domestic prestige item for the studio, working best in select-site bookings.

The Boxer

A once-promising fighter returns home after spending 13 years in a British prison, only to find his city of Belfast now a place full of hatred and desolation. He returns to the ring, determined to find a way out of the legacy of despair, and he rekindles a romance with his former lover ("Breaking the Waves'" Emily Watson), who now has both a husband who's himself in prison and a teenaged son that she is raising. In a creative reteaming of four "In the Name of the Father" principals, Daniel Day-Lewis stars, Jim Sheridan directs, Sheridan scripts with Terry George, and Sheridan produces with Arthur Lappin for Hell's Kitchen. (Universal, 12/26 ltd, 1/9/98 wide)

Exploitips: The prestige project "In the Name of the Father" pulled just $24 million for Uni after a 12/93 opening, and that was with Emma Thompson aboard. And that was $10 million better than the Sheridan/Day-Lewis "My Left Foot" managed with a best-picture Oscar. Although Day-Lewis did draw $74 million for "The Last of the Mohicans," most likely "The Boxer" is a title an exhibitor can book with and for pride, knowing it'll pull select serious audiences.

The Big Lebowski

In this comedy/thriller from the Coen brothers ("Fargo"), a man named Jeff Lebowski, aka The Dude, is confronted by gangsters who demand that his wife repay a loan. Puzzled, the unmarried Dude learns there's a millionaire Jeff Lebowski in town, but what he thinks is just a case of mistaken identity worsens as double-crossing, thievery, revenge and bowling follow. Jeff Bridges stars with an ensemble cast that includes Julianne Moore ("The Myth of Fingerprints"), "Fargo's" Peter Stormare and "Barton Fink"-ers John Goodman, John Turturro, Steve Buscemi and Jon Polito. Joel Coen directs; Ethan Coen produces; both Coens script. (Gramercy, 12/25 NY/LA)

Exploitips: After the brilliant big-budget bomb "The Hudsucker Proxy," the Coens needed a hit; now after the long-running and Oscar-winning "Fargo," audiences are likely to say "yah" to their next. Based on that, and bravely forgetting the results from its last forays ("The Portrait of a Lady," "I'm Not Rappaport") into the high-stakes holiday season, Gramercy has long slated this for Christmas Day. Expect this to be the movie of choice for those who aren't looking for the archness of the arthouse but want to avoid the pabulum of the megaplex. Of course, step one is to highlight the Coens' "Fargo" credit.

The Sweet Hereafter

In a small Canadian town, a school bus accident kills dozens of children. With the residents variously trying to deal with the tragedy, a big-city lawyer ("The Fifth Element's" Ian Holm) arrives with promises of lawsuit riches. Some become clients; then a survivor has a crisis of conscience, and her decision transforms the town. Sarah Polley and Maury Chaykin co-star. Atom Egoyan ("Exotica") directs and adapts the Russell Banks novel, and he produces with Camelia Frieberg. (Fine Line, 12/24 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Although Cannes winners have an uneven record stateside, "The Sweet Hereafter" did win three promotable awards, including the Grand Jury nod. In a four-star review (August issue), our Cannes critic said this "stirring portrait of a community struggling to heal" is "distinguished by an array of fine performances, Egoyan's signature evocative camera work, and a story that leaves one thinking without heavy-handed moralizing." The coastal bow could give this arthouser time to win more citable U.S. review support.

Ma Vie en Rose

In this French-language comedy, whose title translates as "My Life in Pink," a married couple (Jean-Philippe Ecoffey and Michele Laroque) have a new and happy suburban life except for one thing: Their nine-year-old son (Georges du Fresne) believes that he's a girl. Although Dad initially is far less than understanding but Mom comes to his support, when social pressures set in the parents experience role reversals. Belgian Alain Berliner makes his directing debut, and he scripts with Chris Vander Stappen; Carole Scotta produces. (Sony Classics, 12/25 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In a glowing four-star review, our Cannes critic (September issue) said this "rare gem" was "a scathingly funny, brutally critical commentary on gender roles and bourgeois thinking.... [Berliner] deftly renders his cinematic suburbia at once real and surreal, with a tone that manages to be both hilarious and affecting. Amid a color palette of extremes—cotton candy-pink dresses, an electric blue sky—Berliner's characters exist in a Magritte paradise." Expect superb arthouse numbers into January.

Good Will Hunting

Matt Damon ("The Rainmaker") stars as Will Hunting, a remarkably bright but defiant young man from South Boston whose only hope to avoid a pending jail sentence is therapist Sean McGuire (Robin Williams, in "Dead Poets Society" mold), a former college professor with an admiration for Hunting's emotional struggles. Stellan Skarsgaard (also in "Amistad"), Ben Affleck ("Chasing Amy") and Minnie Driver ("Grosse Pointe Blank") co-star. Gus Van Sant ("To Die For") directs; Matt Damon and Ben Affleck script; Lawrence Bender (also "Jackie Brown") produces. (Miramax, 12/25 NY/LA, 1/9/98 wide)

Exploitips: Given its close ties to Bender, Miramax—which has been accused of a see-what-sticks release approach—will be providing this full support; Williams' presence plus the platform release suggest the distributor expects strong coastal response to help persuade midlands auds to try out Van Sant product. If Coppola's "The Rainmaker" has been a hit, the Damon name will be a young-crowd pull.

Great Expectations

This modern-day retelling of Charles Dickens' classic novel follows the journey of aspiring artist Finn Bell ("Gattaca's" Ethan Hawke), whose life is invaded by a dangerous convict named Lustig (Robert De Niro), the beautiful but icy Estella ("The Pallbearer's" Gwyneth Paltrow) and an old, crazed eccentric, Nora Dinsmoor ("G.I. Jane's" Anne Bancroft). Chris Cooper ("Lone Star") and Hank Azaria ("The Birdcage") co-star. Alfonso Cuaron ("A Little Princess") directs; Mitch Glazer ("Three of Hearts") scripts; now Fox-based, Art Linson ("The Edge") produces. (Fox, 12/31 ltd, 1/16 wide)

Exploitips: Last year's big literary adaptation—"The Crucible," also from Fox—underperformed ticket and Oscar expectations, and that was with the august Daniel Day-Lewis in the lead. Although Hawke in comparison might recall a certain vice-presidential tongue-lashing ("I knew Jack Kennedy, and you're no Jack Kennedy"), perhaps his teaming with Paltrow and the contemporary setting will pull the necessary twentysomething crowd. Cuaron's touch was near-perfect directing "A Little Princess," though that's hardly a salable credit. Despite the update, a bookstore tie-in could aid on the distaff side.

O Amor Natural

This documentary focuses on a posthumously published book of erotic poetry by the Brazilian Carolos Drummond de Andrade and on its effects for everyday elderly Brazilians reflecting on love and sex. Heddy Honigmann ("Metal and Melancholy") directs and scripts; Pieter van Huystee produces. (First Run, 12/31)

Exploitips: Documentaries don't sell, but sex does, so emphasize the subject matter's erotic nature and the exotic Brazilian setting. Given that this is for very specialized moviegoers, that the source material is a book of poetry is actually a selling point.

Cretors is proud to announce the introduction of the micro-processor control system called "Logic" for the Diplomat and President model poppers. The heart of this new control system is a micro-processor that is programmed to simplify machine operation. With one touch of the START button on the membrane switch panel, the operator can turn on the kettle heat; dispense one charge of popping oil into the kettle, turn on the agitator motor, and the forced air exhaust system all at the same time. Independent control of these functions is still possible, but rarely needed with the automation provided by Logic's micro-processor control.

Logic does more...If the operator fails to continue the popping process and leaves the kettle heat on, the micro-processor will turn the heat off and shut down the machine. Logic also controls the oil pump and provides the operator with the ability to adjust the amount of oil that is delivered to the kettle. In addition Logic also controls and maintains the pump heat. Automate operation, reduce cost and maintenance, save time and money with Cretors' Logic Option.

Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil

Based on the best-selling novel, this evocative drama stars John Cusack ("Con Air") as a young writer from New York on assignment to cover a Christmas party thrown by a wealthy antiques dealer, Jim Williams ("L.A. Confidential's" Kevin Spacey). When Williams is arrested for murder, however, the writer's article evolves into a book about a murder trial, Southern gentility, old-world social graces, family wealth, illicit romances and sudden violence. Jude Law ("Gattaca") and Jack Thompson ("Excess Baggage") co-star. Clint Eastwood directs; John Lee Hancock ("A Perfect World") adapts the John Berendt book; Eastwood produces with Arnold Stiefel for Silver Pictures and A.P. Productions. (Warner Bros., Dec. undated)

Exploitips: Behind the camera in the '90s, Eastwood has been hit ($101 million for "Unforgiven," $72 million for "The Bridges of Madison County") and miss (together, "White Hunter, Black Heart," "The Rookie" and "A Perfect World" made barely $50 million). The solid cast here—including the Oscar-minted Spacey—and the always popular Eastwood name (even without Clint on camera) promise good results, perhaps near the $60 million that "Absolute Power" generated. A bookstore tie-in should pay dividends, as with several other films this month.

DEC. UNDATED

Cousin Bette

This comic adapation of the classic novel by Honore de Balzac tells the 1840s story of the aristocratic Julot family, replete with adultery, fortune hunting and characters of suspicious virtue. Jessica Lange, Kelly MacDonald ("Trainspotting"), Elisabeth Shue ("The Saint") and Bob Hoskins star. Stage director Des McAnuff makes his movie helming debut. (Fox Searchlight, Dec. undated)

Exploitips: Obviously art-house material—say "Balzac" to many, and they might guess it's a video game—"Cousin Bette" wades into a month made for specialized material, of course meaning there's lots of competition. The quality cast raises this a notch above most, so emphasize the names. Expect a bookstore tie-in to draw the distaff demo.

LATE MOVIE MOVES INTO OCTOBER...

RED CORNER

In this thriller, a savvy entertainment lawyer (Richard Gere) comes to China to broker a big TV deal. While celebrating, he seduces a beautiful Chinese woman. Awaking the next morning, he finds himself accused of raping and murdering her. Caught in a legal system that affords no presumption of innocence and provided a skeptical court-appointed attorney (Bai Ling), he faces imminent execution. Jon Avnet ("The War") directs, and he produces with Jordan Kerner, Rosalie Swedlin and Charles Mulvehill; Ron Koslow ("Last Dance") scripts with Robert King. (MGM, 10/31)

Exploitips: This looked to be boxed into a corner itself when "Red Corner" was slated for 11/26, not only versus "Alien Resurrection" but also just 12 days after audiences had seen Gere in "The Jackal." In a superb date move, this now goes Halloween—not as good a date generally, but it puts "Red Corner" against two studio openers with lower profiles.

I LOVE YOU, I LOVE YOU NOT

An adolescent girl ("William Shakespeare's Romeo & Juliet's" Claire Danes) suffering both estrangement from her fellow students at a private Manhattan school and a crush on a popular boy (Jude Law) wins wise advice from her grandmother (French icon Jeanne Moreau), a Holocaust survivor with a special appreciation for life. Mamet casting director Billy Hopkins makes his directing debut; Wendy Kesselman adapts her play. (CFP/Avalanche, 10/31 ltd)

Exploitips: Featuring an intriguingly eclectic cast, this debuts against no new arthouse competition. The Moreau and Danes names could well attract both mature specialized auds and younger newcomers to the smart set.

CRIES OF SILENCE

In a hurricane's wake, a mute teenaged girl (Erin Buchanan) washes onshore; a young doctor (Kathleen York) living with her mother (Karen Black) assumes custody of the girl, who seems terrified. Little by little, the doctor begins unearthing a shocking secret. Avery Crounse directs, scripts and produces. (Showcase, 10/3) refugees finally emerge, they find their country's landscape indeed devastated, but from a new war. Emir Kusturica directs, and he scripts with Dusan Kovacevic; Pierre Spengler produces. (New Yorker, Dec. undated)

Exploitips: This won best picture and best actress awards at the Giffoni film fest in Italy; it's a ways for exhibitors wishing to draw auds to travel for kudos, but it adds a bit of panache.

Exploitips: This won the Palme d'Or at the '95 Cannes, though a bit dated as a kudos. "Underground" had a very limited stateside run this summer. Our Cannes critic accorded it 4 1/2 stars, calling it "a sprawling, imaginative, bold and impressive work.... Kusturica's balance of humor and pathos keeps the film from becoming preachy or dogmatic, yet it resonates with sensitivity and contemporary relevance."

The Mouse

John Savage stars as shamster/prizefighter Bruce "The Mouse" Strauss, who teaches a young buck the ropes about boxing, the art of the scam, and how to be knocked out with grace, style and minimal damage. Angelica Torn co-stars. Dan Adams directs and scripts. (Strand, Dec. undated)

Exploitips: Promo tie-ins with local health clubs could raise the profile with male audiences most likely to give this a try.

THE BIG TIME

IMAX and its Competitors Take Large Format Film From the Museum to the Multiplex by Alex Albanese

OUTER LIMITS: IMAX's long-standing relationship with NASA is reflected in "Mission to Mir," a recent title.

The 90s, a decade that was supposed to be all about "cocooning"—staying at home with the 36-inch screen and cable's multiplicity of choices—has turned out to be one of renaissance in film exhibition. The reasons for this are varied and complex, from the healthy economy, to a huge drop in crime, to Brad Pitt; but some explanations are simple. People like to go out, and our industry has relearned the wisdom of two generations ago: when people go out, not only do they want to do something special, they want to be someplace special.

Economic necessity killed the movie palaces of the past, but more was lost than just carved marble and atmospheric ceilings. Today not only the old attitudes, but the moving clouds have made a comeback—on the lobby ceiling if not the auditorium. Megaplexes, those modern movie palaces that provide the latest in technology along with classic service, themed detailing and cappuccino, are adding a new weapon to their arsenal of excitement. It is a feature that until fairly recently was looked upon by mainstream exhibition as not only marginally relevant, but as being as stodgy and quaintly exotic as a gilded plaster dragon. But images can change fast in show business, and after waiting in the wings for 25 years, today's hot new exhibition star is the 15/70 large-screen format, pioneered by IMAX Corp.

Until about four years ago, large-format film lived a quiet, almost bookish life, far from the hurdy-gurdy of Hollywood. Traditional fare consisted of educational documentaries because, aside from venues built for world's fairs or amusement parks, the bulk of large format theatres were attached to science and natural history museums. The format has done an outstanding job of serving that arena, and it continues to do so; but as Sony Classics vp Mark Katz, who has been distributing the format for 10 years, points out, that was not necessarily the plan. "If you read interviews from 25 years ago," he states, "the original vision of the founders of IMAX Corporation, who pretty much pioneered this industry, was to build commercial theatres that would run commercial films and be the cinema of the 21st century. But they didn't get anywhere with the studios back then, and their first buyers were museums, who were looking to basically do the planetarium of the '70's. They had to make a living, so they took the customers they could get, and the content of the films that were produced mirrored that."

In 1994, when the Toronto-based IMAX Corp. was acquired by Bradley Wechsler and partner Richard Gelfond, they examined broader options. "We looked at IMAX's branded quality with respect to family entertainment," states Wechsler, "and that was something we didn't want to walk away from, but we also saw a phenomenal technology that we felt was really underexploited. If you could present such beautifully clear pictures that extend into your peripheral vision for documentaries, why couldn't you also move that over to more standard entertainment fare?" Wechsler and Gelfond decided to expand the company by moving IMAX into more conventional entertainment venues. They also had a new product to launch: IMAX 3-D. "Our instincts told us there was a potential large demand for well done 3-D titles," Wechsler states.

> "IMAX appeals to people who want truth and reality in some fashion."
> —Greg MacGillivray

The first commercial 3-D IMAX theatre to open was at Sony's Lincoln Square in Manhattan, in November of 1994. Part of a state-of-the-art, flagship megaplex, it has become one of the highest-grossing single movie screens in the United States. "Sony came in and proved you could put a state-of-the-art 3-D IMAX within a multiplex and be successful," states Katz, "and they proved there was an audience appetite for more than the standard documentaries that had been made thus far." In the wake of that success and thanks in part to the new, less expensive IMAX SR theatre installation, which is designed to be incorporated into more conventional multiplexes, there has been a flurry of other commercial exhibitors signing contracts with IMAX all over the world.

ON TOP OF THE WORLD: IMAX takes its cameras to the roof of the Himalayas with "Everest." Why? Because it's there.

"One of the impediments for growth at IMAX has been the capital cost of putting in a theatre," Wechsler explains. "They are expensive, which obviously limits the number of viable sites around the world. So we started asking ourselves what makes IMAX special, and it occurred to us the experience can be reproduced in a different scale. We realized we could geometrically reduce the size of our average theatre from 425 seats to about 275. By doing that, we came up with a plan where IMAX theatres can be integrated into multiplexes for around half the cost of a stand alone IMAX theatre." The practical importance of this more compact IMAX experience is obvious: Unlike a traditional IMAX theatre, which requires a population base of at least one million, the new SR installation can be supported by a community of 500,000.

In North America, the SR concept has been embraced by several circuits. In June, IMAX signed a deal with Regal Cinemas for ten 3-D SR systems, and in July Edwards Theaters signed on for 10 as well, bringing that circuit's total up to 13 IMAX venues. Regal executive vp and COO Greg Dunn feels that prior to this new SR concept "there were very limited applications as to where you could build an IMAX theatre within one of our megaplexes. They've opened themselves up to many more markets around the country, and we are just now seeing this concept take off, and I think they will be successful with it. There are definite synergies between IMAX and conventional theatres, and we plan to grow off those."

As Mark Katz points out, "What a large-format theatre does for a multiplex, whether it's in New York or a small midwestern town, is elevate the perception of the technical capabilities of the whole complex. It also gives you a daytime business that you're just not going to get with conventional cinema. That gives you more exposure and more daytime traffic, which ultimately benefits your concessions. In the evening, you can package your IMAX films with your conventional films because the IMAX attraction is only an extra 40 minutes."

Regal's director of marketing, Phil Zacheretti, agrees. "In several ways," he states, "we think it will bring people to the complex that might not normally come, or might not come as often. With IMAX being a different experience, you're going to find a lot of school groups, tourists, and we think we'll find a little bit of the older crowd that might enjoy the subject matter. It can be that little extra draw, particularly at a time when we normally aren't as busy." Regal's move into IMAX is "based on what we think we can make happen. With moviegoing in general on the increase, not just revenue but attendance, we think we are entering the business of the future."

IMAX now has 154 theatres built worldwide, and a backlog of 55 on the boards. Once those are built over the next two years, there will be almost as many commercial IMAX theatres as museum-based ones. With large-format competitors Iwerks and Showcsan recently merging to ensure they can also get a chunk of the exhibition pie, now the big question is not so much "if you build them will they come," but what will they want to watch. This is where opinions start to diverge.

There has been a range of product experimented with over the last few years, from the straight-ahead 3-D undersea documentary "Into the Deep" to the full on 3-D narrative "Wings of Courage." There have also been documentaries with a more visceral than educational appeal, like the Indy cars of "Super Speedway" or the roller coasters of "Thrill Ride." Another permutation, "Across the Sea of Time," exploits the 3-D effect by contrasting antique stereoscopic views of New York City with modern-day swooping helicopter shots, but cramps all the bravura visuals into a rather stilted narrative framework.

Traditional IMAX fare has, by necessity, had an educational, documentary slant. "The bulk of the older 2-D theatres are in institutions where the museum mission statements require that the films shown have a very strong educational orientation," explains Derval Whelan, executive director of marketing at Sony Pictures Classics. "Our films definitely tend to be on the more commercial side, but we strive for a really good combination of entertainment and education because that's what the marketplace needs right now. As the commercial sector grows, our films will probably work to satisfy those needs more in the future—the demand is going to go in the direction of more entertaining rather than educational films. But three of the current six distributors of large-format films are museum based, so I think there will still be companies to serve the educational needs of that part of the marketplace."

Greg MacGillivray, whose company MacGillivray Freeman has made 18 large format films, still feels there will be more films produced for the educational market than for the strict entertainment market. "I think that the real key for a filmmaker like myself," he states, "is that my films will become skewed slightly toward entertainment and subjects which lend themselves toward entertainment and away from subjects that are solely educational. I was careful to word that sentence in a specific way because there is a subtlety there. You don't just put out a film like 'The Living Sea' and say this is an educational film, period. A lot of films work both ways and the audience sees the value in both directions—highly entertaining but also enriching."

"Our 'Everest' film coming out next year is a good example," he continues. "It's a story film centered around three people, but it's non-fictional. It is about as akin to what we should be doing, in my estimation, as any film that's come out. You take a subject like that and install a story and characters, giving the audience the experience of being someplace, which IMAX does do well, along with characters they can identify with. That's where I think the medium should be going—more toward fuller filmmaking rather than simplistic documents, as has often been the case in the past."

"The industry has been debating this within itself for awhile," states Sony's Mark Katz, "and it's not a black and white thing. There's no one who can say that a narrative is not educational, and you can't say a documentary isn't entertaining, but some might not do both as well as others, and multiplexes are going to demand more narrative-oriented product because their audiences don't want too many documentaries. Based on what our instincts and research tell us, the audience wants a good story, because a good story transcends any medium at the end of the day."

"IMAX," counters MacGillivray, "because it is so crystal sharp and real, appeals to people who want to have truth and reality given to them in some fashion. Now that's not to say that something like 'Apollo 13' wouldn't work in IMAX. I think it would, but I really do believe it's a different experience than just a storytelling medium and that's a subtle difference the audience is picking up on. If the split becomes 50/50 in terms of the number of theatres, that doesn't account for the numbers of attending audience members, and currently the museum facilities do considerably larger grosses and larger numbers than commercial facilities."

MacGillivray doesn't feel documentary will necessarily play second fiddle to narrative in commercial theatres. "You can go back historically and look at the grosses for 'This Is Cinerama' and 'The Living Desert,' documentaries that were unique but distributed more or less conventionally, and found a market," he says. "If you do a film that is exceptional it will draw extremely well. With the increase in theatres and better marketing, I don't see the documentary draw being that different from the narrative draw if they are marketed in similar fashion and if they are both commercially viable."

"If you make a solid 3-D documentary with the right subject matter in today's environment it is as economically viable, if not more so, than making a narrative that costs more," concedes Katz. "But we did some research, and there is no question that the most frequent IMAX-goers, who are growing in number every year, want narrative bigtime. I firmly believe it's a case of timing. Someday with reasonable budgets, making an $8 or $9 million 3-D narrative versus a $6 million dollar 3-D documentary will be very much worth the extra cost. Once the creative side of the large-format industry can figure out a way to tell a great story using the tools of IMAX that doesn't have an astronomical price tag, there will be a breakthrough, there's no question." "Some feel the vista in a large format film is the most important component," observes Whelan, "that the visual of soaring over the mountaintop just can't be compared to seeing somebody sitting in a room, acting. Others think IMAX is supposed to take you to a place that you could never go to on your own. There are many great uses of the medium. At Sony Classics we take it on a project-by-project basis—whether we felt that it is worthwhile in the marketplace, and is something that should be done in IMAX rather than be done as a TV documentary or a feature film."

She then mentions MacGillivray's "Everest." "There have been any number of IMAX films done in snow-capped mountains. I mean, you see the same themes coming up over and over again, which is one of the things that Sony wanted to change when they got involved with this business—to exploit more new subject matter. But I can't wait to see 'Everest' because, although I've seen a million IMAX movies that take place in the same geographical kinds of locations, they followed the tragic expedition that happened last year, and I think it's going to be extremely different from those which have come before it."

> "If we don't give the audience an emotional, escapist experience the way good conventional films do, all these nice big palaces that are being built to accommodate IMAX screenings are going to get a conventional 35 projector and stop showing IMAX."
> —Mark Katz, Sony Classics

One thing almost all parties interviewed for this story were in agreement on regarding 15/70's move to become a mainstream entertainment choice is that the breakthrough film, the one that through word of mouth becomes a must-see for the general public, has not arrived yet. "It's still to be made, and we are anxious to find the person that will do it," says IMAX's Wechsler, "especially when you're talking about IMAX 3-D. The rhetoric of filmmaking, storytelling, and visual presentation—call it the killer application—it hasn't been discovered yet. Maybe it will come from some kid fooling around in film school right now, or maybe one of the more established Hollywood directors will take a diversion from 35mm and have the vision of what will work in large format. But I think we've yet to see it."

Paramount has announced it will produce a 3-D IMAX "Star Trek" short, and some feel perhaps this will be the film to put IMAX on the mainstream map. "You know, it looks fantastic on paper," states Katz. "'Star Trek' is an established entertainment phenomenon with a huge following. If they actually pull it off and it's good, it might just be the breakthrough film this format is looking for." Loews Theaters president Travis Reid concurs. "'Star Trek' could be the breakthrough. It will probably be typical of the length of the TV episodes, which is perfect—everybody has seen these stories told very effectively in that time frame. We'll be able to get the same kind of turnover we're used to, and the subject could really capitalize on special effects, how great they can look on such a huge screen, with that clarity."

Whatever the breakthrough, the long term, widespread success of the format will ultimately rest on one factor. "First and foremost," Katz concludes, "the films have got to keep coming and keep improving, so the industry can hopefully generate better returns and we can keep making more and better films. Because right now the technology is still what people are coming for—it's still not the film quite yet. We're getting there, becoming more software driven, but we have a ways to go. That's what will carry this medium forward. Because if we don't become software driven, giving the audience an emotional, escapist experience the way good conventional films do while perhaps pushing harder on some of the other senses, then all these nice big palaces that are being built to accommodate IMAX are going to get a conventional 35 projector and stop showing IMAX. That's one thing I feel very strongly about."

Greg MacGillivray is in complete agreement. "What the increased theatre base will do is enable us to make a better film," he says, "because we'll have more venues to show the film, and we can make more money back so next time we can have a bigger budget and better writing, better acting, better everything. It hopefully will end up improving the quality of IMAX filmmaking—that's the big crusade that I have. Let's write better films, make better films and give the audience better filmmaking.

"I still think it will take years before the awareness of IMAX and the quality and consistency of the product gets to a level that the audience can be assured that their $7 or $8 dollar investment will be worthwhile," adds MacGillivray. "But it will be crucial for everyone involved that this industry arrives at that place."

COASTING TO SUCCESS

Pacific Theatres' New Builds Are Making Waves

by Bridget Byrne

PACIFICATION: The Beach Cities 16 in Manhattan Beach, Calif., is one of the first builds under Pacific's new expansion plan.

In Southern California, it's Pacific Standard Time. That is, Pacific Theatres is setting standards with several new megaplex builds in El Segundo, San Diego, the San Fernando Valley, Anaheim, Northridge and Bakersfield. Pacific's Hawaiian arm (known as Consolidated Amusement Co.) is also opening new locales, including sites in Koko Marina, Honolulu; Pearlridge, Aiea; and Kaahumanu, Kauhului. The rapidly-expanding circuit, which currently operates 328 screens in California and Hawaii, will add 189 more screens to its tally by April of 1999.

Chan Wood, Pacific's executive vice president, head film buyer and director of marketing, says these megaplexes are "examples of the ultra-modern complexes which will typify Pacific's future growth."

But at the same time, Wood points out that 'typical' is not a word to apply to a Pacific cinema. "Each of our theatres has its own personality," says Wood, pointing to a colorful brochure illustrated with styles of architecture ranging from sleek modern to elaborate art deco.

The 51-year-old company, begun with the purchase in 1946 by William R. Forman of some existing drive-ins, owns and operates theatres as diverse in style as the nostalgic and famous slice-of-a-giant-golf-ball Cinerama Dome on Sunset Boulevard and the all-that-glitters El Capitan on Hollywood Boulevard; as modernistic as the Gaslamp, set to open this month in San Diego; and as vast in scale as the Kapolei Theatre, the largest entertainment center in Hawaii, with 16 auditoriums built on over 8.5 acres.

But what Wood insists must be typical of each and every theatre, whatever its design, wherever its location, is the excellence of presentation. So although there is no prototype for a Pacific Theatre, there is always an assurance that the customer is what matters. "It's like keeping a drinking glass clean. If there's a smudge on your glass, you are not going to have a good experience whatever the contents," says Wood about the importance of customer service.

Wood points out that many of the films Pacific shows are also onscreen at competitors' theatres, so "choice" takes on a different meaning. "Today, people want a choice of films to see at any given location, and they want a multiple choice of show times so that they can turn up at the theatre and find something to see within no more than a 20-minute to half-hour wait," says Wood, summing up one of the main reasons why Pacific is thinking in huge complex terms.

The style in which the film is projected and viewed is the ultimate priority. All of Pacific's new theatres have been designed with widely-spaced rows of stadium seating for a clear, unobstructed view from highback chairs with moveable cupholder armrests. The complexes will all feature Sony SDDS, DTS and Dolby Digital sound systems, and every auditorium will be THX-certified. "Everything the public wants today is definitely in the theatre," says Wood.

But sitting, seeing and hearing are just part of the exhibition experience, and Pacific Theatres is devoting much thought to other elements, such as spacious, attractive lobbies; a broad range of concessions; and convenient, easy parking with safe access.

"Theatregoing has become more than just seeing a movie," says Wood. "The theatre is the place for a social gathering, an outing. People these days arrange to meet in the lobby to decide which film to see. They might split up for different movies and arrange to meet again in the lobby afterwards, or families split up so that the children can see a G-movie while the parents take in an R." Pacific has responded to this pattern in patron activity by making the theatre lobbies appealing, expansive meeting places with comfortable dining areas providing more interesting and sophisticated varieties of foods than your typical concession choices. Wood says the company is negotiating with restauranteur Wolfgang Puck to bring the famed chef's innovative, eponymous cafes on-site, like the one neighboring the Pacific Beach Cities Cinema 16. Pacific also hopes to enter into more tie-ins with Houston's Steak House, another adjacent eatery.

Thoughts are also being directed toward different manners of food service, such as selling refreshments to patrons in their seats by having ushers circulate snack trays. Pacific is also considering implementing a combined "film and food" service through which food can be pre-ordered along with a ticket for immediate pick-up on arrival at the theatre.

An innovation of a different kind is a paging service for patrons. Designed chiefly to ease the worry of parents who have left children home with a baby-sitter, Pacific offers it as a complimentary "peace of mind" service. A parent who leaves a driver's license as a deposit at the boxoffice is given a pager which can be silently beeped by an operator at the theatre. The theatregoer can then come to the lobby to take the incoming call. Refrigerator magnets bearing the pager service phone number are given out to interested patrons.

Keeping one step ahead of the competition is, Wood believes, vital in a business where there is currently lots of "fierce competition." "There's a lot of building going on—the shelf life for a theatre has become shorter, definitely so in the California market," he says, referring to the brief amount of time it can take for new technologies and industry standards to make pre-existing theatres obsolete. "Five years ago, they were building eight- to 12-plex theatres. Today, they're building 16- to 30-screen theatres. [Other differences include the advent of] stadium seating auditoriums, with the wall-to-wall screens. So if you built an eight-plex five years ago, that theatre would be really outdated already, even though it's [practically] a brand-new theatre. The people are demanding a better presentation, more variety, more choice with their showtimes, and restaurants and entertainment-type projects."

"It's like keeping a drinking glass clean. If there's a smudge on your glass, you are not going to have a good experience whatever the contents."

Wood is able to speak with authority about the evolution of the exhibition industry, having joined Pacific Theatres' film department 40 years ago in 1963. ("I started very young, by the way. A mere child," he hastens to add with a laugh). The most significant change Wood has observed over the decades is the increased number of prints available, and the resultant impact on booking practices. "It used to be pictures would open in certain areas of the country, like East Coast or West Coast or the South. And they would work with maybe 200 prints, and move those prints from the South to New York to the Midwest to California. And while that was going on, there would be a picture opening in California, then going down to the South, then going to the Midwest. And there was never a national availability. [In the '60s,] a picture playing the Dome theatre, like 'Mad, Mad World,' would play for a year. Today, a picture like 'Lost World' opens on 4,000 screens and grosses $100 million the first week. And in five weeks or six weeks, the picture's gone."

Prior to joining Pacific, Wood's first-ever job was as an usher at the Inglewood Drive-In. Pacific, which built its success on drive-ins, still owns a few, such as the Vineland four-plex in the San Gabriel Valley, the Hi-Way 39 four-plex in Westminster and the Vermont Tri-plex in Gardena. But the move away from that type of exhibition, begun by Michael R. Forman, who succeeded his father as Chairman and CEO in 1981, continued even more aggressively when Michael's son, Christopher, took over the CEO reins a couple of years ago and began focusing on building larger theatres—often on the sites once viable as drive-ins.

"Our company's mission is to build the biggest and best state-of-the-art theatres during this time of aggressive expansion," says Wood. "You go to a movie to be entertained. It's not the exhibitor's fault if the picture is not good, but it is the exhibitor's job to make sure the sound is clear, the picture is clear, the temperature is right, the theatre is clean and comfortable, the popcorn is hot, the parking is secure and the customer service is good and directed to making sure you enjoy your visit and want to come back."

LET THE GAMES BEGIN!

The Sega GameWorks Team Offers Exhibitors a New Kind of Bang for Their Buck by Pat Kramer

With competition between exhibitors on the rise, theatre circuits are discovering the virtues of adding more high tech video and interactive amusements to their lobbies, providing an additional source of revenue while giving moviegoers extra reasons to visit their facilities. Many exhibitors are now setting aside prime space or designating specially-designed alcoves for these amusements, where they can be enjoyed by visitors without causing traffic problems.

Sega GameWorks (SGW) has taken a leading role in this process via its Sega Cities and GameWorks divisions. Back in 1995, the company, then known as Sega Enterprises, formed its first exhibition partnership with United Artists by participating in the development of UA's Starport entertainment center in Indianapolis. Other Starports followed at UA multiplexes in Baltimore, Austin, Denver and Albuquerque, giving the circuit its own interactive games franchise for retail mall locations. Ranging in size from 6,000 to 8,000 square feet, the early Sega Cities aimed to target the teenage/young adult market with a design that was light, bright, attractive and fun.

Next was a Sega partnership with Cineplex Odeon to develop the 18,000-square-foot Cinescape facility in Calgary, Alberta, which opened on July 2, 1996. Cinescape combined Cineplex's existing five-screen theatre in Eau Claire Market with Sega's latest cutting-edge amusements: interactive games, electronic motion simulator devices, movie-themed pinball games and 10 high-speed Internet stations. Another Cinescape was built in Houston, Texas for Cineplex later that year. According to Howard Lichtman, Cineplex's executive vice president of marketing and communications, both facilities have resulted in increased business. "We're seeing a definite synergy between the Cinescape patrons and the movie patrons and the cross utilization is very high, as was our hypothesis. It is the moviegoer who is going to Cinescape and it is the Cinescape customer who is going to the movies."

Cinescape was the first official exhibition project under the banner of Sega Gameworks. Earlier that year, in March 1996, Sega Enterprises joined forces with Universal Studios and DreamWorks SKG to form Sega GameWorks L.L.C., a limited liability corporation. SGW is comprised of three core business: games under the Sega brand; operation and expansion of the original Sega Cities division, which includes the placement of games in theatres; and a new division: GameWorks location-based entertainment centers (LBEs).

LUCKY BREAK: An SGW "WaveRunner" environment lets users skim over simulated seas.

In the past year, SGW has launched GameWorks facilities in Seattle, in Las Vegas and in Ontario, California. With an average size of 30,000 square feet, the GameWorks sites are all adjacent to large multiplexes or megaplexes and feature the latest of SGW's proprietary line of interactive video games, motion simulators and amusements.

> "In some districts, we've actually increased game revenues 150 percent district-wide."

At the Ontario facility on any given weekend day, you'll find a mix of teenagers, young adults and families lined up to play an assortment of adrenaline-producing games that test their balance, reflexes and sense of adventure. "Alpine Racer" is a perfect example: the gamer places his or her feet in molded plastic skis to steer down an incredibly fast-paced ski course as it flashes by on a video screen. Other games include "Hang Pilot" for those who enjoy the thought of hang-gliding but have reservations about doing it in the flesh; "Golden Tee" for would-be golfers; "Super Shot", which issues actual basketballs for practice shots through a moving hoop; and "The Lost World: Jurassic Park" where one or two players ward off attacking dinosaurs by shooting simulated bullets at a video screen while seated in a simulated jeep.

New and even more innovative titles include "Vertical Reality" and "Game Arc." Described as a cross between a video game and a motion simulator, Vertical Reality straps three players at a time into chairs facing a two-story screen where they must shoot moving targets or get shot. The player's chair rises to a maximum height of 40 feet, depending on the skill of the players. The chairs are quickly lowered to the floor when players run out of ammunition or are caught in a fatal crossfire.

Like Vertical Reality, Game Arc is for those who like to test their reflexes, shooting at simulated villains while sitting in a small car mounted to a moving platform. Moving images are projected on a large screen while high fidelity sound creates the aura of battle in an underground world inhabited by dangerous aliens. With Game Arc, price is dependent on how long one chooses to continue.

SMART MOVE: A GameWorks patron uses a Smart Card debit card to go for another play.

"This whole concept is very, very hot today," states David Stroud, GameWorks' director of new business development. "We think there's a lot of opportunities today with the investments the major chains are making and the fabulous properties they're creating." David Wilhoyte, director of Sega City and Game Operations adds, "GameWorks works well in places with a broad entertainment mix including theatres, retail stores and restaurants. The theatre chains are an important part of that mix, creating more of a total entertainment destination for consumers."

Some opponents of location-based entertainment centers feel they create competition for exhibition by eating up a share of the money consumers bring to each location. Stroud says that's not been the case. "At other entertainment venues, where these components don't exist, business has not increased as much as at our larger locations. The more you offer people, the more they're going to get out and enjoy themselves and spend money. It's truly creating a destination that is more than one stop in an evening's activities."

At GameWorks facilities, all games are set up to take "Smart Cards"—debit cards which are purchased in advance. In addition to moving patrons through the entertainment center quickly, Wilhoyte says the Smart Cards have been found to increase per patron spending.

While Wilhoyte says there's no "average" per-game price at GameWorks sites, the money spent on higher-end games is fairly steep. Motion simulated games like "Alpine Racer" and "Hang Pilot" cost $1.25 and $1.50 per two-to-three minute game. "The Lost World" costs $2 per player, but to play the entire course from beginning to end might take six or eight tries, and might therefore be costly. "Game Arc" costs $2 per play, while "Vertical Reality," one of GameWorks' "premium" amusements, runs $4 per game.

Besides the pinball, video and motion-simulator games, GameWorks offers access to the 'Net via the "Internet Lounge." Patrons are provided with comfortable chairs and laptop computers where they can access an abundance of different sites, chat rooms, or information resources through specially-designed web pages. At $2 for every 10 minutes, this is a resource for those who are looking to send an e-mail or do a little browsing. To make sure those using the simplified system don't get lost, an Internet consultant is stationed in the room to answer any questions that arise.

SGW has ambitious development plans, with a goal of opening 100 GameWorks sites worldwide by the year 2,002. The next GameWorks facility will be opening in Grapevine, Texas this fall followed by Tempe, Ariz. and other locations, including Rio De Janeiro. While the more elaborate GameWorks sites are being planned in high traffic locations near large exhibitors, SGW also is trying to establish partnerships with smaller exhibitors through its Sega Cities division. Stroud is in charge of setting up those joint ventures within theatre complexes, which range from installing a few amusement devices to areas wholly designated for games. "We examine and measure the proposed area for the games, checking out the traffic flow," says Stroud. "After that, we provides assistance in design and theming for the games, as well as installation and maintenance."

While he's eager to increase business for the company, Stroud acknowledges that not all theatres are right for hosting Sega Cities. "If we don't feel that the theatre has the right design or is the right venue for our games, then putting a lot of games in is really not a good idea. When we visit the theatres, we try to explain to [exhibitors] that the games are a very important component of their business. We also like to make sure they have the newest and latest games and make sure they are kept absolutely clean, like everything else in the theatres."

Stroud says revenues are up at many of their joint ventures. "We've really started to dress them up and make them a destination in themselves. As a result, in some of the districts we've gone into, we've actually increased game revenues 150 percent district-wide." Wilhoyte adds, "We've been successful at improving the performance of games in theatres that historically may not have been performers, through carefully selected games and superior service. We want to ensure that when we do commit to a partnership with a theatre or any other game operation venue, that we can meet our mutual expectations for game earnings and our ability to service their needs."

In keeping with their expansion plans, SGW has just completed a new design concept for Sega Cities. Wilhoyte says the size of the facilities will remain roughly 6,000 to 8,000 square feet, but the theming will be more decorative. "[The new concept] is colorful, eclectic, dynamic. It's a theatrical, whimsical environment, very different from the current Sega Cities look, but very inviting. Again, it's a combination of having a theatre and a high-quality game room with a lot of traffic."

Describing the strides SGW has taken in just 18 months, Stroud points to the three GameWorks facilities that are up and running: "To go from concept to design to installation to opening was just a tremendous feat!" He attributes that achievement to chairman Skip Paul. "He's put together an unbelievable team. I've never seen a team as smart, creative and effective at realizing their goals, so I'm really excited to be a part of this."

While he's guarded about revealing too much about the company's future plans, Stroud says, "We're looking at and involved with a lot of different countries and are talking to several exhibitors at this time. But no doubt about it—there will probably be a Sega City or GameWorks coming to a neighborhood near you soon!"

STATE OF THE ART

MGM Chairman and CEO Frank Mancuso asks tough questions about today's film biz by Frank Mancuso

At this year's ShoWest convention, MGM Inc. chairman and CEO Frank G. Mancuso provided a keynote speech that held back no praise yet pulled no punch. Mancuso's comic anecdote about two men and a bear drew laughs, and his promise that MGM would lead the way toward establishing a year-round release schedule drew applause, but his calls for decreased—or at least more profit-oriented—spending by both the production and the exhibition communities were straight-arrow serious. Because Mancuso's address was filled to overflowing with analysis of do-or-die importance to professionals in all areas of the film industry, BOXOFFICE here offers a transcript of Mancuso's commentary for our readers attending ShowEast.

IN LIKE A LION: MGM chair Frank Mancuso (in his office at the studio)—a man willing to discuss hard truths.

So what was I thinking? I'll bet that's a question that went through many of your minds, that day back in the summer of 1993, when you found out I was assuming the chairmanship of MGM. Actually, I was thinking my golf game wasn't getting much better, even though I was practicing, so this seemed like a more attractive alternative.

Some alternative! We were faced with the task of taking over this great film company—which had struggled through a series of ownership and management changes and with an industry that barely believed it still existed—and restoring it to its rightful place as one of Hollywood's premier studios. I took great comfort in the wisdom of Yogi Berra's remark, "It ain't over 'til it's over," and we got on with the task.

And succeed we did, thanks to the hard work of a group of talented, seasoned professionals in every division of the company, and thanks also to the support of exhibitors. You believed in our efforts and supported our film slate. In 1994 and 1995, we started to accomplish our goal and justified the faith of the exhibition community with films like "Stargate," "Rob Roy" and "Species." And later, with successes ranging from the award-winning "Leaving Las Vegas" and "Get Shorty" to "GoldenEye" and "The Birdcage," we proved that the Lion still had plenty of roar left in it after all.

Yet it wasn't long before MGM faced challenges once again, with a sale of the company that would determine its future. This time, we weren't just looking at a studio that had to overcome difficulties to return to prosperity. We also had to contend with a changing industry, production and marketing costs that were reaching the stratosphere, and an exhibition business that had made the price for screen expansion overly costly.

So what were we thinking, when our management group teamed with Tracinda Corp. and Seven Network to buy MGM? Actually, we were thinking that many in exhibition were up against the same set of challenges—that we were not alone. We had all faced long odds at one time or another in growing our businesses. We were all going to have to change, and we would all probably have to do it together.

> "We are cannibalizing each other's audiences and shortening the life of a film."

But why change? This industry has been good to us, hasn't it? After all, American copyright industries, which include filmed entertainment, are among the largest and fastest-growing sectors of the economy. They account for more than five percent of the country's gross domestic product. They—we—create new jobs more than twice as fast as does the economy as a whole. Further signaling the strength of our business, the percentage of the moviegoing public that attends movies frequently rose by 14 percent from 1990 to 1995. That's a 14 percent increase in the number of people who go to the movies at least once a month.

There's still more good news about our industry. The amount of money spent on movie admissions has risen every year since 1939. Since the Depression ended, we've had over five-and-a-half decades of consecutive increases in dollars spent in this country on going to the movies. And Americans aren't the only ones spending record amounts on movie tickets. Exhibitors are building new, bigger and better theatres around the world. The new spate of construction in international markets parallels the multiplexing of America 20 years ago.

CLIFFHANGER: Mancuso likens exhibition and distribution to the title characters from "Thelma and Louise," so drunk with a sense of freedom and empowerment that they exercised it by driving off a cliff.

Exhibitors should be proud that, at home and abroad, the moviegoing experience is better than ever for consumers. New theatres are larger and more comfortable. But if our reality is new and bigger markets, increasing frequency of attendance among moviegoers, better technology, and more dollars than ever spent on movie tickets, then why does the film industry have to change?

It has to change because there's another dimension to our reality, and we have ignored it too long. Just like the characters in a disaster movie, we have been blissfully unaware—or pridefully unmindful—of the problems around us. But the problems are there, and it's time we recognize them and do something about them. If we do, our industry will be stronger than ever.

From 1990 to 1995, the number of screens in America increased by 17 percent. The number of major-studio releases grew by 34 percent. Yet in the same period the number of admissions rose by only six percent.

I noted earlier that moviegoing frequency is on the rise, and indeed it is. But that's only among people already in the habit of going to the movies. People who attend infrequently are not going more often, and the people who normally don't go to the movies still aren't going. Little we've done so far has succeeded in changing their ways.

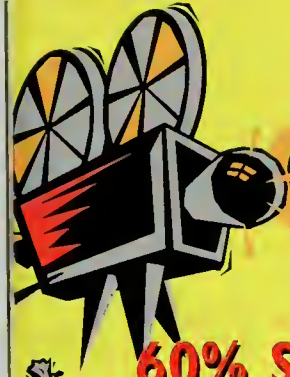
Look at California's San Fernando Valley. In the past three years, the number of screens in the area increased by nearly 80 percent. Yet boxoffice grew only 16 percent. Although we breathed a sigh of relief to see nationwide admissions finally move up last year, that five-year curve still is not very curvy. In fact, admissions were the same in 1995 as in 1989. From 1990 to 1995, screens grew three times as fast as admissions, and the number of releases by five times as much. By comparison, admissions were all but flat.

How much more are we spending on making and marketing our movies? How many more dollars are we spending on building new theatres? And how many new movie patrons are we getting in return? The answers: too much, way too many, and not nearly enough.

Perhaps we've been thinking, "If we build it, they will come." But there's something wrong here, my friends. We're making more pictures and building more theatres. Yet people aren't going to the movies more. We either must find ways to grow our market or cut back on our spending.

Our goal has been growth. But growth at an irrational cost? Growth even at the expense of profits? Exhibitors and studios alike have acted on a mandate to increase boxoffice, and we achieved our goal: a nine percent increase in dollars spent on movie tickets from 1990 to 1995. But we've done it by increasing quantity, not quality. We built more screens and released more movies. We expanded everything except the number of people going to the movies. The size of the pie didn't get significantly bigger; we just carved it up into smaller pieces among more films and more theatres. To put it in the simplest terms, we've spent more and gotten less. We've forgotten legendary venture capitalist Warren Buffet's two cardinal rules of creating wealth. The first rule is not to lose money. And the second rule is not to forget the first rule.

Forgotten it we have. Film companies released more movies in 1996 than 1995, and they are scheduled to release 14 more in 1997 than in 1996. The result? A cluttered market in which it's difficult for a given film to stand out. The result of that? Increased spending on production, to make the film bigger, more exciting, more noticeable. The result of that? Even more spending on marketing, prints and ads, to protect the excessive amounts already spent to make the movie. And the result of that? A run on the market for Maalox.



Studio executives are reaching for relief because supposedly at least 12 movies in 1997 will have production budgets in excess of $100 million. But in an average year only 10 movies top that figure at the domestic boxoffice. I sure hope this won't be an average year.

From 1990 to 1995, production costs soared 36 percent. Marketing costs skyrocketed 48 percent. And, unfortunately, the new numbers for 1996 have continued this unhealthy trend.

The story isn't much better on the exhibition side. Is the competition between two studios dueling over films with similar content really any different from trying to build two megaplexes in the same city or shopping center area? Multiplexes and megaplexes were supposed to help exhibitors reduce their overhead. But when that new theatre is just a short drive away, or down the block, or maybe even directly across the street from your competitor's new theatre, that overhead savings is gone. We are cannibalizing each other's audiences and, by spreading movie patrons across screens rather than across weeks, we're shortening the life of a film.

Just as studios are carving up the audience pie into smaller pieces among more releases, exhibitors are slicing the pie into smaller slivers among more screens. As studios have believed the way to boost revenues is to produce more films, exhibitors have acted on the belief that the way to grow revenues is to build more theatres. But building in overserved areas will not help your bottom line.

If just one exhibition company were building megaplexes, if one studio were producing big-budget pictures and spent tens of millions on marketing them, their actions would have the positive effect on the market they want. But when most major exhibitors build new theatres, and build them within shouting distance of one another, and when most studios release event movies and do it in the same competitive period, they neutralize the impact of what could have been market-leading strategies. They cancel out each other's efforts; they defeat each other's purpose.

We're like the two characters in "Thelma and Louise." After surviving a string of disasters, Thelma and Louise embarked on a joyriding escape from the law. They ultimately drove themselves off a cliff rather than face capture. Roger Ebert described them as "intoxicated with the sense of their own freedom." That sounds like us! We've lost our sense of restraint, continually overproducing and overbuilding. Like Thelma and Louise, we're heading for a cliff. But will we stop before we go over the edge? I believe we can, and I believe we will. We're all part of an industry that is without equal in the world. No other country, even those with thriving film industries, has created a force to rival the American entertainment industries. We, along with the talents that collectively make up the industry we call Hollywood, have built this unique business, and we can bring it back from the edge.

Competition is the food that feeds us, the drive that sustains us. It should not be the obsession that hurts us. Remember the story of the two men being chased by a bear? When one stopped to put on his sneakers, the other yelled, "You fool, you can't outrun a bear." The first man yelled back, "I don't have to outrun the bear. I just have to outrun you." We're so busy trying to outrun each other that we're all losing sight of the bear, the "huge, hairy beast" Jack Valenti once cited when describing our escalating costs.

So what do we do?

First: Studios should make fewer movies and concentrate on quality more than on quantity. Audiences—and exhibitors—often wonder how studios can make so many bad movies. The truth is, studios have been trying too hard to fill an imaginary need for their distribution pipelines. But overproduction has caused the pipe to spring a lot of leaks: bad movies and clutter.

"Studios have been trying too hard to fill imaginary needs for their distribution pipelines."

Better movies will play longer in your theatres, giving them time to be discovered. And fewer films will reduce clutter, giving movies a greater chance to open well and hold better, drawing an audience over a longer period of time. We at the studios must concentrate our resources on films to which we can fully devote our attention, our care, and our skill—in production, marketing and distribution—to enhance the efficiency of the system.

Second: Studios should release their movies in a more orderly, 12-month release pattern. I know you've heard this before. I think it was mentioned in a breakfast room in San Diego at the first ShoWest.

And here we are, still talking about it. If it's any better today it's an accident, a by-product of overproduction. We all need to do better. There's so much proof that a year-round release pattern makes sense. Look at the January 1997 re-release of "Star Wars." It outgrossed any Thanksgiving or Christmas 1996 release, and gave our industry one of the best first-quarter admission numbers in years. Look at the successful runs of MGM's "Get Shorty," an October release, and "The Birdcage," a March release. A film does not have to open in summer or over the holidays to be a hit.

Studios must distribute pictures throughout the year, spreading our schedules across all 12 months to help reduce the clutter. Film fans don't lose interest in movies just because it's early February or late September, and your theatres don't cost you any less to operate when you have no new quality releases to show. A yearlong release pattern of want-to-see films, not just any films, will keep your patrons happy and your theatres full.

tion, we will pace our films evenly, by spreading such upcoming titles as "The End of Violence," "Hurricane," "Red Corner" and "Tomorrow Never Dies" across the coming months. We will follow that in 1998 with "The Man in the Iron Mask" in January, "The Mod Squad" in February and "Species II" in March. And we will continue to implement a year-round release pattern as we build our slate from this strong beginning.

Third: We must follow our instinct, not a formula, for what makes movies work. Studios must make movies because they tell a great story, because they entertain, not because they conform to some theory about budgets. I don't believe Hollywood should only make movies budgeted at less than $20 million or more than $70 million. That's like saying you can eat only canned tuna or caviar, can shop only at Sears or Saks Fifth Avenue. There is no formula for what will make an audience cry, laugh, cheer and, yes, come back again and again. If there were, we wouldn't need filmmakers; we'd only need accountants.

Fourth: You, our colleagues and friends in exhibition, must start building theatres in under-served towns and neighborhoods, instead of overbuilding in cities already saturated with screens. I know some of you are already doing this. Exhibitors can and should continue to build new theatres to lure in new moviegoers and raise those crucial admissions numbers. Building theatres practically next door to one another will only help you divide, not conquer.

Examine your markets. Study your audience. Consider your competition. And then build your theatre—but not where competitors are building. Build it where your audience needs it and wants it, where it is long overdue. Build where you will draw in new movie patrons, raise admissions, and grow your business and this industry. Give patrons in a new area the pleasure of this new experience.

"Exhibitors are slicing the pie into smaller slivers among more screens."

Fifth, and finally: We must join forces—studios and exhibitors working together for our common purpose. With the new technology we've put into making films and building theatres, the theatrical experience is without question better than ever. Yet the investment we have all made in better theatres and bigger movies has not yet reaped the benefit it should.

So we must do one thing more. We must create a joint industry campaign to promote moviegoing, urging those who haven't shared in this incredible new enhanced experience to come to the movies—and inviting those who have come to come again and again. Dairy producers have their "Got Milk?" campaign. The beef board has its "Beef: It's What's for Dinner" effort. With a new cooperation between you in exhibition and us at the studios, with a creative collaboration between NATO and the MPAA, we can create a campaign that tells the world, "The Movies: There's No Place Like It at Home."

With such a campaign, we can grow our business; we can recapture the lost patron's imagination; we can increase the number of people who go to the movies and love doing it. For perhaps we have become complacent and have allowed ourselves to believe that the movies are so woven into our cultural fabric that audiences will always come. We must remember—and we must remind—that it is in movie theatres that we are swept away in a larger-than-life format, to a larger-than-life adventure or romance or drama. It is in movie theatres that we scream in fright along with everyone else, or laugh with joy with the rest of the crowd, or wipe away a tear and feel better to see others doing the same. It is in movie theatres that we share an experience.

Whatever the mystique of the movies, I call upon exhibitors and studios alike to celebrate the theatrical experience with the world. For if we build it—the theatre in the under-served area, the movie that entertains and satisfies, the film slate with the year-round audience appeal, and the message of the new wonder of movies—they will come.

AN INDIE PRODUCER'S HANDBOOK

by Sam Arkoff

Legendary producer Sam Arkoff could easily be termed one of the most influential figures in movie history. As co-founder of American International Pictures—an independent producing and releasing company whose output spanned three decades and over 500 titles—Arkoff pioneered many of the releasing strategies that are second nature to today's studios, and helped launch the careers of generations of talent.

*In this knowing commentary, Arkoff gives the benefit of his experience to aspiring indie producers everywhere. Given the high profile independent and specialty product has attained recently, it's advice applicable to anyone in or out of the film industry who seeks to understand the way things work.—Editor

Independent producers have a chance if they can start with unusual stories that also are well told. Not just one or the other. Both. Extravagant special effects are not enough. Boxoffice "stars" are often not enough. Audiences have been overfed with spectacles and superstars. They are beginning to ask for more, as the disappointing grosses on some recent extra-costly releases reveal.

This gout from grandiosity is an invitation to the new producer to find creative ideas and writers to put together something new, and then do one of two things: Preferably and hopefully capture the cooperation of a major studio that will finance the picture and provide for its marketing; or find other financing, from various places and interests throughout the world, to get the picture made and distributed. Look at the recent Oscar nominees: indie movies do get completed somehow.

Indie filmmakers who hope to raise funds should first find a recognized distributor. There aren't many whose track record is strong enough to attract outside capital. One solution is to deal with the "art-house" division of a major. There are about five of these, and they may provide the assurance that foreign or non-industry investors require.

Obviously the cost of film production has grown much faster than the inflationary spiral. This has torpedoed many of the so-called smart guys in the studios who have poured hundreds of millions into hoped-for blockbusters, and who have announced that there is no future for less expensive films. This is nonsense. In spite of many of the summer superfilms costing more than ever before to produce and market, audiences still don't buy dollars, they buy fresh entertainment. How many ships have to sink before our industry stops making TITANIC, extravagant disaster movies?

One way the independent producer can look at his profession is to consider what happens on Broadway. A project may begin off-Broadway or even off-off Broadway. If it is a surprise hit in these less expensive birthplaces, it may be picked up by the moneyed interests and financed for a Broadway run. The trick, again, is to come up with a unique idea and make sure it is well-written.

When raising money it is best if the first funds come from the U.S. Foreign distributors and investors want to know that some American interests are putting their dollars where other currencies are also wanted. Today, it is less important to have a "sort-of" star name attached than to have a guarantee of release.

It is a truism that if a film should be made, it can be made. Where the money will come from is sometimes hard to envision at first, but somehow it does materialize in most cases—provided the will is strong and the material worthy. Major studios need unique, independent product to release. They must enrich their slates with films such as "Fargo," "The English Patient," "Sling Blade" and "Scream."

The day of the cheap imitation of yesteryear's successes is pretty well over—at least as a picture that gets theatrical distribution. Difficult as it is, in many ways it is easier to get independent films made today than ever before. There are all sorts of courses given in and out of educational institutions teaching the "hows." There are also lots of experienced people ready to pitch in with the making of an independent film—cheaply, or even on spec. Equipment is plentiful, inexpensive, and more user-friendly. You want to make a movie? People want to help.

If you don't have that great story yet, find the right novel and option it. Many books have been optioned for as little as $500 a year, or even less. Then find a way to pitch it—or a screenplay based on it—to the studios. Unless you have the support of a major star or director, don't permanently attach any element, including screenwriter, stars, director, special effects people or anyone else; the final money people may have other ideas. It is okay if those elements indicate they would like to be in on it.

Having co-produced and/or released hundreds of movies myself, I can confidently state that there will always be a place for the talented independent, but you must have a strong and money-ready organization prepared to launch your films knowledgeably in the U.S. and abroad, and to sell them to all the ancillary markets. And ideally, but it isn't easy, it would be helpful to have financing for subsequent pictures lined up, too. After all, no one can be certain that any one picture is going to be a winner.

IF THEY KNEW WHAT YOU WERE MISSING: Part Three

WHY TODAY'S MOTION PICTURE SOUND SYSTEMS FAIL TO MAKE THE GRADE AND WHY THEY CAN'T SOUND BETTER

by John F. Allen

Motion picture sound is critically important in setting the emotional atmosphere of a film. Sound alone is often the determining factor in knowing if a scene is a comedy or tragedy. Obviously, the better the theatre's sound presentation, the better the film works. If sound is, as some insist, more than half the show, how can exhibitors best exploit its potential? BOXOFFICE contributing writer John F. Allen continues his important four-part series of articles exploring the present state of movie theatre sound along with some valuable guidance. Part one was published in the April, 1997 issue of BOXOFFICE. Part two appeared in the July, 1997 issue.

In part one of this series, I reviewed the inadequacies of typical loudspeakers found in motion picture theatres. Part two covered the amplifier power required by all types of loudspeakers for proper presentation of digital soundtracks. These columns detailed why, without investments in upgrading or replacing most of the speakers and amplifiers presently installed in theatres, audiences simply will not hear the true quality available from digital films. Exhibition will also miss a golden opportunity to redefine what the moviegoing experience can be.

Rather than concentrating further on sound system components or equipment, this article covers sound system equalization or tuning. As hard as it may be to believe, I will explain why virtually every motion picture sound system in existence is mistuned and, more often than not, severely mistuned.

How can this be? Don't technicians use real-time sound analyzers? Don't they equalize every channel of every sound system according to "industry standards?" Well, yes they do. Sort of. And therefore don't all stereo sound systems sound perfect no matter what equipment is used? Furthermore, don't they all sound the same? Well, no they don't.

The fact is that theatre sound systems do not sound the same even when they are outfitted with identical equipment in identical theatres. The problem is that the measurements technicians rely on to equalize movie theatre sound systems are hopelessly inaccurate and totally unrepeatable. Indeed, regardless of the quality and performance of the speakers and amplifiers installed or even the room's acoustics, one of the major reasons that movie theatres can't sound better than they do is poor tuning.

The sound systems which get "tuned" the most have the distinction of not only sounding worse than they should, but each time they are re-equalized, audiences get to hear a different example of mistuning. In my own experience, one of the most ridiculous examples of this concerns the HPS-4000 systems which I designed and installed for the Century Plaza theatres, screens 2, 3 and 4, in Los Angeles. From day one, the largest of these theatres (#2) has been hailed by critics and producers alike as "the best in the area, if not the country."

Since these theatres are often used for premieres, the sound systems are constantly being checked. Normally one might think this would be a good thing. But such is not the case. One technician after another has marched in, set up his microphones and before listening to anything, totally changed the equalization—even if he had been there the week before and done the same thing. Seals I installed on the equalizer modules are ripped apart and ignored. When all is done, the sound systems usually end up sounding shrill with no bass—in other words, ruined. The technicians then listen and complain that it doesn't sound good even though their measurements "look good." Mostly they don't complain at all, which is even worse.

The technicians then listen and complain that it doesn't sound good even though their measurements "look good." Mostly they don't complain at all, which is even worse.

The situation became so bad the theatre purchased a second set of equalization modules for everyone else to use. The equalizers I set, the so-called house cards, are sealed and should be left alone. For 10 years now, technicians have had their own equalizer modules with which they may do what they will. As soon as they leave, it is understood that the house cards will be reinstalled. If ever proof is required that the measurements these well-meaning technicians are making are inaccurate and unrepeatable, consider this: In 10 years, no technician has ever set the second set of equalizers the same way twice. For 10 years, no technician has been able to achieve a sound quality as good as, let alone better than, that which is available by simply using the house cards as is. Why is this so and what can be done? There are actually several complex factors at work here. I will attempt to deal with some of them one at a time.

When measuring the frequency response of a speaker in a theatre, a technician typically sets up anywhere from one to four microphones in the rear two-thirds of the theatre. Pink noise is played through each speaker or group of surround speakers. The noise is, of course, picked up by the microphones and graphically displayed by the analyzer in 27 one-third octave bands.

According to what has now become industry practice, motion picture sound systems are equalized so that their measured frequency response matches the "X" curve (see Figure 1). The frequency response characteristic of this curve is flat from 100 Hertz (Hz) to 2000 Hz and declining -3 dB per octave from 2000 Hz and above. At first glance, one might look at this and wonder why there is a curve at all, when what we are supposed to be listening to is a sound system with a flat frequency response (i.e., no curve). After all, when the pink noise is connected directly to the analyzer the measured response is equal at all frequencies, or flat.

In actuality, once pink noise is played through a loudspeaker and becomes airborne in a room the size of a theatre, it will no longer measure flat on a real-time analyzer, even when it is. This is primarily due to that amount of room reverberation which the microphone sees which is also added to the measurement. Since there is a relatively large amount of low-frequency reverberation and very little high frequency reverberation, we see a rolled-off response on the analyzer showing more total lows than highs.

Were we able to completely remove the reverberation from this measurement technique, we should see a frequency response characteristic which is flat to around 8000 Hz and down around -3 dB at 16000 Hz (see Figure 2). This high-frequency loss above 8000 Hz is due to the insertion loss of the screen as well as the high-frequency absorption of the air. Yet the "X" curve shows that the frequencies from 2000 Hz to 8000 Hz are also attenuated. So what's going on? It turns out to be a characteristic of this measurement system to show such a response, which begins falling off above 2000 Hz, when we are in fact hearing a response which is flat out to as much as 8000 Hz before falling off. In other words, we're in trouble already.

The ISO 2969 and SMPTE 202M standards, which now encompass this measurement approach, take the size of the theatre into account and provide for a higher rate of high-frequency rolloff for larger and more reverberant theatres, and a somewhat reduced rate for smaller theatres. What they do not take into account is that the "knee" of the curve, where the rolloff begins, also varies with room size and acoustics. This is clearly seen when one uses loudspeakers with a flat frequency response in different theatres. Unfortunately, most speakers used in theatres are not flat and have a significant high-frequency rolloff themselves. Indeed, unless one uses flat speakers, there is no possible way to know where the knee of the curve should be for any particular theatre (see sidebar).

As we are beginning to see, there are many shortcomings with this approach. Any one of them is enough to completely mislead a technician. The most important issue we must understand is the difference in the way we hear and process sound, versus the way microphones work. When sound happens, it travels directly from the source to our ears. Assuming we are indoors, it also bounces off the walls, ceiling, and floor as well as everything and everyone else. Echoes of the sound reverberate throughout the room until they die out.

The first arrival of the direct sound at our ears is very important. The first arrival is what our brains use to characterize the tone as well as the direction of the sound. It also triggers our brains to suppress the earliest reverberations of the sound so that we do not hear them. This is critical to our hearing process. Our ear-brain hearing mechanism makes a clear distinction between the initial direct sound and later reverberant sound.

We experience one example of this reverberation suppression, or rather its absence, when we listen to someone speaking to us over a speakerphone. They sound like they are in an echo chamber. In fact, we hear so much reverberation of their voice and the room they are in, we can have trouble understanding them. Yet, if we were standing next to them in that room, we would not hear the reverberation even if we tried. Our brains suppress it very effectively.

Of course, the reason it's so easy to hear the reverberation through the speakerphone is because its microphone doesn't have a brain. Measurement microphones and real-time analyzers don't have brains either. And unless we take this into account, neither do we.

Not only do microphones respond to the first sound arrivals, they also pick up all the reverberation in the room and add it to the direct sound without distinguishing one from the other. The result is a totally contaminated measurement. This mess is then displayed on the analyzer and is generally mistaken as representing the frequency response of what we will hear in the theatre, when nothing could be further from the truth. Unfortunately, virtually all of today's motion picture sound

GETTING A BETTER EQ
by John F. Allen

While the original cinema sound system far-field measurements and equalization procedures seem to work well with the older speakers in use when the "X" curve was researched, modern installations require a more critical approach. Since no current technology exists which can measure what something sounds like, we must learn to get more accuracy out of the real-time analyzers we have and also learn to better interpret their displays.

To that end, the following suggestions are offered to technicians responsible for equalizing motion picture sound systems. Some of these suggestions may seem like heresy. But they're worth a try and certainly won't hurt. Sound system tuning is as much an art as balancing a symphony orchestra. It takes years to develop the skills required. Even then it's still an art. The following should be a good beginning:

1. Set the real-time analyzer for maximum averaging time and minimum resolution (2 or 3 dB per division), whenever speakers are measured.

2. Place all the measurement microphones in the third row of the theatre. If using a single microphone, place it in the middle third of the third row where the frequency response displayed looks the worst in the 100 to 500 Hz range.

3. If the screen speakers are all the same, as is usually the case, equalize the center channel for a smooth response, but not better than ±2 dB. Avoid boosting. Use cuts only, if at all possible. Then adjust the controls for the other screen channels to match the settings of the center. Ignore the analyzer's display of the frequency response of the other speakers. However, the analyzer may be useful in balancing the high and low frequency sections of a bi-amplified speaker system. Setting the equalization for all the screen channels the same as the center will ensure that they will sound the same. Do not adjust any one-third octave bands below 80 Hz. If the low-frequency bands below 100 Hz look elevated, do not be concerned. They can be left alone for now.

A special note about third-row measurements of speaker systems with constant directivity horns: When these horns are placed behind a screen, the coverage angles of the higher frequencies are increased around 20 degrees in all directions beyond the screen. This directs an excessive amount of these high frequencies toward the front rows. The sound in these seats may normally be too bright when the rest of the theatre sounds normal. In such a case, the "X" curve will not be seen when the microphones are in the near-field, and the real-time analyzer's display will show a more nearly flat high-frequency response.

4. Move the microphones. If using four microphones, place them along the center line of the theatre, starting from the center of the seating area to about 10 feet from the rear wall. If using a single mike, place it in the center of the seating area.

5. Adjust the equalization of the surrounds for a flat response ±2 dB from 100 to 10000 or 12000 Hz. The equalization adjustments should be the same for both surround channels.

6. Set the optical surround delay so that it equals, in milliseconds, the total length of the theatre plus 10. A 70-foot-long theatre would therefore have a delay of 80 milliseconds.

7. Using only the microphone located in the center of the seating area, set the processor to the stereo optical format "04". Adjust the equalization of the subwoofer to cut everything above 80 Hz.

8. Set the fader to "7". Adjust the sound pressure levels (SPL) for each channel using the one microphone placed in the center of the seating area. This location is the most symmetrical between all the speakers and will provide the best channel-to-channel balance. The optical surround level is best set with the Dolby CAT-151 film and the surround delay at "0".

9. When finished, listen to a good 20 minutes of familiar feature film material—not trailers. Make equal adjustments to each channel's treble as your ears require. If peaks in the frequency response can be positively identified, make adjustments to all three channels accordingly. Also, adjust the fader for a normal dialogue level. In terms of SPL, normal dialogue (not shouting or whispering) peaks at around 80 dBc, with occasional peaks to 85 or 86 dBc. Note the new fader setting. If other than "7", reset the fader to a point equal on the other side of "7". (If the fader is at 6 1/4, reset to 7 3/4.) Readjust all SPL levels at this fader setting and note it as the calibration setting for future servicing. Recheck the reference film dialogue level. The fader should be at "7" when the level is normal.

systems have been equalized with these distorted measurements and as a result fail to deliver their best possible performance, whatever it may be.

The sad fact is there is no technology available which can measure what something sounds like. However, with measurements more heavily weighted to the direct sound and away from the theatre's reverberation, we can get far better results. Until we have a new measurement system, simply moving the microphone(s) to the front of the theatre, typically around the third row, will dramatically increase credibility of the display on the analyzer (see Figures 3, 4 and 5).

To illustrate, Figure 3 shows a third row, or "near-field," measurement of a full-range, fully horn loaded loudspeaker located behind the screen of a 600-seat theatre. This excellent theatre is large enough for the high-frequency rolloff to begin at 2000 Hz and conform nicely to the theoretical "X" curve. The low frequencies appear elevated. But this is actually a normal measurement for a speaker system like this which, with a 10 1/4-square-foot low-frequency radiating area, is fully coupled to the air in the room down to frequencies below the 40 Hz range. In other words, don't try this with ordinary speakers.

Figure 4 is the measurement of the same speaker in the same theatre at the same time, but with the microphone in several locations two thirds of the way back in the house. Note the differences as seen in Figure 5, particularly the 5 dB peaks at 500 and 1250 Hz. These "measured" peaks are most curious as they do not exist when we actually listen to the sound system. In fact, it is quite impossible for a loudspeaker to have such a radically different frequency response simply by standing 30 or 40 feet farther away.

Differences of the kind seen in Figures 3, 4 and 5 are often seen between a theatre's separate screen speakers as well. Though they are only 15 to 20 feet away from each other and in the same room, differences of as much as 8 dB in one or more of the one-third octave bands are regularly seen. This again is completely impossible unless the speakers are defective. Unfortunately, many technicians have been trained to believe such measurements, even though they defy common sense. Sound systems are routinely equalized to "correct" these differences. In the process some rather huge distortions are actually introduced to the frequency response of the direct sound heard by the audience. Papers about this problem started appearing in the early 1970s, prior to the introduction of real-time analyzers to the movie theatre industry. These papers have been all but ignored, for reasons I have never been able to understand.

A further note about the lowest frequency bands: Looking again at the bands from 40 to 100 Hz in Figures 2, 3 and 4, it needs to be understood that when using pink noise, the measured level of these bands is dependent on the size of the theatre and of the speaker systems. Suffice it to say that the "X" curve appears to show that the speakers used in the 1970s, when the curve was researched, lacked deep bass. For when a full-range flat speaker playing continuous steady-state pink noise happens to measure with an elevated low end, the tone of actual program material sounds balanced. If the bass of such a large speaker is turned down, the sound becomes decidedly thin and unnatural. Unfortunately, there is no real way to know where these lower frequencies should measure relative to the mid frequencies. So unless a problem can be heard when listening to films, it's probably best not to equalize screen speakers below 80 to 100 Hz.

One of the arguments used in defense of the present theatre sound system measurement and setup practices is that they allow the technician to "equalize the room." This is a misnomer, as there are no adjustments to the room at all. It might be better referred to as equalizing for certain effects of the room. Indeed there is some validity to this, as room acoustics do alter the perceived tone of what we hear from a loudspeaker. However, the effect is primarily limited to the frequencies below 400 to 500 Hz.

Unfortunately, steady-state pink noise-based measurements do a terrible job detecting these room effects no matter where the microphones are located. Even in the front of the theatre, room effects can be completely missed. This is due to the steady state nature of the pink noise and the conditions of acoustic equilibrium thus created in which the measurements are taken. These conditions very often mask these important room effects. Real sound, particularly speech, is transient and dynamic. So we can easily hear these (now unmasked) effects even though the analyzers tell us they aren't there. The moral is, if the ears say there is a problem and the analyzers say there isn't—the ears win.

So, how poorly tuned are today's theatre sound systems? Unfortunately, pretty poorly! In August 1995, I demonstrated the differences in sound quality resulting from three different equalization and measurement techniques—my own, plus the two methods outlined in the ISO and SMPTE standards. The program was produced for the International Theatre Equipment Association's annual convention and took place at General Cinema's highly successful Framingham, Mass. facility. I repeated this program in April 1996, for an audience of over 330 local members of the SMPTE, the Audio Engineering Society, the Boston Audio Society and the Acoustical Society of America.

The program consisted of selected recordings and film clips, played four times each. First, the sound system was equalized according to my own proprietary High Performance Stereo (HPS) near-field tuning techniques (see Figure 3). Second, the system was equalized to show how it would sound using the typical far-field four-microphone measurements (see Figure 6). These settings were done by a senior industry sound technician. For the third example, the sound system was equalized using a single microphone in several locations two-thirds back from the screen (see Figure 7). Fourth, the clips were again played back through the normal HPS near-field tuning (see Figure 3). To everyone's ears, the HPS near-field tuning sounded best by far. Here's why.

Figure 3 shows the normal response, typical for a theatre of this size with the HPS near-field tuning. Figure 6 shows the changes to this equalization when four microphones placed in the far-field are used to measure the system. Figure 7 represents the changes made when one microphone is used in the far-field.

Just imagine what happens to clean smooth sound when it is passed through such equalizations as shown in Figures 6 and 7. As you can see, neither had any bass. The four-mike tuning was also excessively shrill due to the erroneous boosts above 1000 Hz. The boosts of as much as 10 dB in the 160 and 400 Hz range gave the sound a "honky" quality making everyone sound like they were speaking in a phone booth or through a fire hose. This "honky" characteristic, commonly associated with movie theatre sound as well as horn-loaded loudspeakers, is bad sound, pure and simple. Yet it has been so prevalent in theatres for over 60 years that I've actually run into one or two who thought there was something wrong when the sound was so natural they didn't hear it. So, while there are some poorly designed speakers (horn-loaded and otherwise) which can produce a honky quality, this aberration is also caused and exaggerated by improper equalization, as well as technicians who would seem to be all too forgiving.

The sound quality resulting from the single-mike far-field tuning (Figure 7) was also unacceptable. The high and low frequencies were essentially gone. The rest of the sound was pure mud with a heavy dose of midbass.

In both of the far-field tunings the background sounds were diminished or wiped out altogether. The stereo image was narrowed. Music quality was also severely impacted. The sound from the improperly equalized surrounds all but vanished as the entire soundtrack collapsed into the screen.

The important thing to understand out of all this is that all three equalizations done for this presentation measured the same on a real-time analyzer and "conformed" to the ISO and SMPTE standards, or at least looked like they did. Yet the sound of each was radically different. The other important realization is that thousands and thousands of today's motion picture theatres are routinely mis-equalized with the kinds of errors shown in Figures 6 and 7.

THE 1997 HONOREES

LEE ROY AND TANDY MITCHELL

Salah M. Hassanein Humanitarian Award

Cinemark USA chairman and CEO Lee Roy Mitchell and Cinemark USA executive vice president Tandy Mitchell are the recipients of the 1997 Salah M. Hassanein Humanitarian Award.

LEE ROY MITCHELL opened his first theatre more than 35 years ago. Growing up around his family's theatre business, he worked in every facet of exhibition, from buying and booking films to popping corn. Starting his own theatre business in Ennis, Texas, Mitchell built and expanded his circuit into the largest independent theatrical exhibitor in the state of Texas.

In 1984, Mitchell sold his original theatre company but retained the Cinemark name. After a short retirement, he started his quest to expand Cinemark into a major American and international theatre circuit. As a result of his efforts, Cinemark is now the fifth-largest motion picture exhibitor in North America, with 1,680 screens in 29 states, plus additional sites in Canada, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Ecuador, Japan, Mexico, Peru and El Salvador.

In addition to providing vision and leadership at Cinemark, Mitchell has served on the NATO board of directors as well as the boards of Nest Entertainment and the Southern Methodist University Meadows School of the Arts.

TANDY MITCHELL has held various leadership roles at Cinemark. She currently serves as executive vice president of the company and provides direct supervision of theatre operations and corporate projects. According to Tandy Mitchell, Cinemark's success is based on complete customer satisfaction—a goal she and Lee Roy Mitchell have always striven to satisfy.

The charities supported by Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell include the Peaceable Kingdom Retreat for Children, Variety Club of North Texas/Children's Charity, Bill Glass Ministries, Young Life and the SPCA of Texas.

JIM MURRAY

Founders Award

The 1997 winner of the honor variously known as the Founders Award and the Distinguished Service Award, JIM MURRAY began his career in the exhibition business the old-fashioned way: He started as an usher. Today, he is vice president of U.S. operations for National Amusements (whose chairman is another who began at the industry's bottom rungs: Sumner Redstone). National Amusements, founded in 1936 and by 1996 the nation's eight-largest circuit, projects that by year-end 1997 it will have 944 stateside screens at 104 sites.

Murray has been a key part of National Amusements' growth for a quarter-century. He joined the company in 1973 as a district manager and by 1988 was managing the entire East Coast region. In 1991, Murray transferred to National Amusements' Dedham, Mass., corporate headquarters, where he took up his current post. Despite his long tenure at National Amusements, he is only now equaling his time spent at Century Theatres in New York, where he previously worked for 25 years as well.

Active outside the office, Murray is president of the Variety Club of New England. Through his efforts, Murray coordinated collections for the Jimmy Fund, which this year reached a tally of $598,000. In addition, he had the nation's highest sales of Gold Hearts for Cystic Fibrosis. Murray also serves as a director on the boards of NATO and NATO of New York, and he is treasurer of TONE. As is common for this award's recipients, Murray has served on the ShowEast Executive Committee since its founding 13 years ago.

JEFF BLAKE

Show "E" Award

The recipient of the 1997 Show "E" Award is JEFF BLAKE, president of Sony Pictures Releasing. As head since 1994 of Sony Pictures Entertainment's domestic theatrical distribution arm, Blake has been a key element in the studio's new-found vigor at the boxoffice.

This past year, Blake has overseen such successful releases as Columbia's "Anaconda," "The Fifth Element," "Men in Black" and "Air Force One," and TriStar's "My Best Friend's Wedding." During the holiday season, TriStar will offer two high-profile films: "Starship Troopers," a Paul Verhoeven sci-fi actioner opening Nov. 7, and "As Good As It Gets," a James L. Brooks film starring Jack Nicholson.

Before taking his current post in August 1994, Blake was president of domestic distribution for Columbia. Prior to joining the Sony team, Blake spent 18 years at Paramount Pictures; after serving in several capacities at Paramount, Blake was named executive vice president and general sales manager of the studio's domestic distribution arm in 1987.

JAMES L. BROOKS

George Eastman Award

Multi-talented writer/producer/director JAMES L. BROOKS is the recipient of the 1997 George Eastman Award. Brooks is a three-time Academy Award winner and 12-time Emmy Award winner. He began his television career as a writer who then later produced television hits such as "Taxi," "Mary Tyler Moore" and "The Simpsons." Brooks began working in film in 1979 when he wrote the screenplay for "Starting Over," which he co-produced with Alan J. Pakula. In 1983, Brooks wrote, produced and directed "Terms of Endearment," for which he earned three Academy Awards. In 1987, he wrote, produced and directed "Broadcast News," which won the New York Drama Critics Award for best picture and best screenplay. Through Gracie Films, Brooks executive produced the feature film "Say Anything," produced "The War of the Roses" and co-produced "Big" with Robert Greenhut.

In 1990, Brooks produced and directed his first play, "Brooklyn Laundry," in an L.A.-based production starring Woody Harrelson and Glenn Close. His most recent film as a director was "I'll Do Anything," starring Nick Nolte and Albert Brooks; he also produced last year's smash "Jerry Maguire," which starred Tom Cruise and was written and directed by Cameron Crowe.

Currently, Brooks is editing the theatrical feature "As Good As It Gets," starring Jack Nicholson, Helen Hunt and Greg Kinnear—a film he wrote, produced and directed.

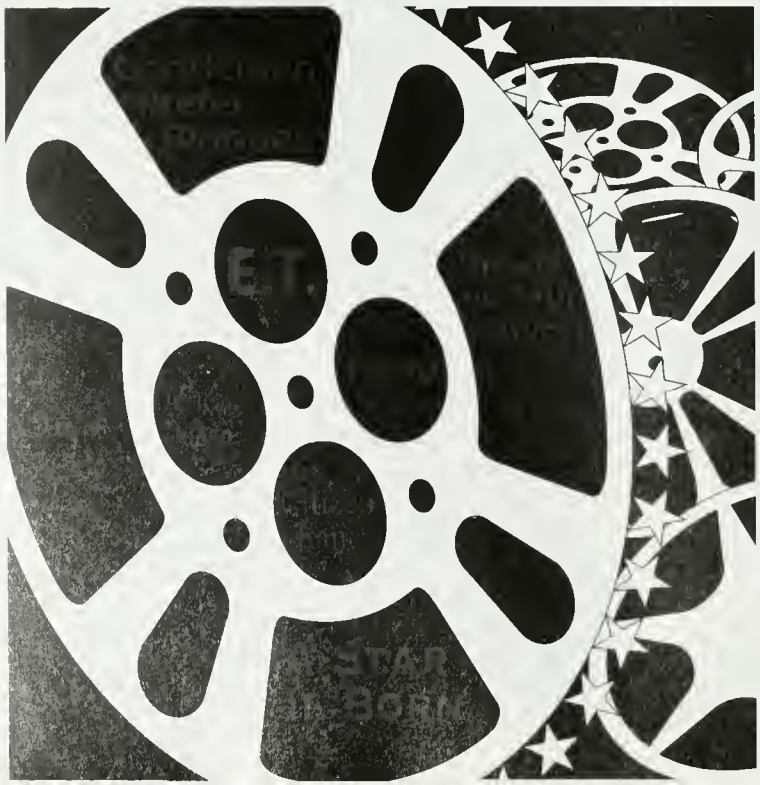
ADAM SANDLER

Comedy Star of the Year

Brooklyn-born comic ADAM SANDLER, who broke into the mainstream with notoriously bizarre characters like Opera Man, Canteen Boy, Carlos and Cajun Man on television's "Saturday Night Live," is the recipient of ShowEast's Comedy Star of the Year award. Sandler's first foray into comedy was at age 17 when his brother encouraged him to go onstage spontaneously at a Boston comedy club. While attending New York University, Sandler continued to perform in clubs and universities throughout New York. Shortly thereafter, he won a spot as part of "Saturday Night Live's" cast for the 1990/'91 season; he and his unique, outrageous characters became increasingly popular over the five years he appeared on the show.



Sandler made his feature film debut in 1993's "Coneheads," and subsequently starred in several comedies including "Airheads," "Billy Madison," "Bulletproof" and "Happy Gilmore." Coming up for Sandler is New Line's "The Wedding Singer," slated to open Feb. 13, in which he'll star in the title role opposite Drew Barrymore. Set in New Jersey circa 1985, the film tells the story of Robbie (Sandler), lead singer for a band that does cover versions of Culture Club and Dead or Alive songs to mixed reactions at small-town wedding receptions. When he's jilted at the altar of his own wedding, he's devastated, and his work suffers.

The role "marries" Sandler's aptitudes as both a comic actor and a singer—the multi-talented entertainer wrote and performed such hits as "Lunchlady Land," "Chanakah Song" and "Red-Hooded Sweatshirt," and has released three comedy albums which feature both spoken-word pieces and songs: "They're All Gonna Laugh At You!," "What the Hell Happened to Me?," and his latest, "What's Your Name," which recently hit record stores everywhere.

Sandler is currently busy co-scripting "The Water Boy" with his writing partner Tim Herlihy. The film, in which Sandler will also star, is scheduled to go into production this month and will be released through Buena Vista.

ANCHORS AWAY

Movie Theatres Are Retail's New Anchor Tenants

by Herb McLaughlin and Howard McNenny

WARNER'S CORNER: Warner Bros. and Nichii Co.'s Warner Mycal cinema-anchored retail complexes in Japan have revitalized once-troubled shopping districts.

Herb McLaughlin is partner-in-charge and Howard McNenny is director of cinema design at Kaplan/McLaughlin/Diaz. KMD is an architecture and urban planning firm with offices in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, Mexico City, Tokyo, Shanghai, Seoul and Kuala Lampur.

Today, the movie theatre is much more than a great place to see the latest Hollywood film spectacular, or even to sample the latest in gourmet snacks. What many theatre operators have not yet realized is that their multiplexes can be a key ingredient in successfully revitalizing our nation's cities.

Find that hard to believe? Here are just a few examples:

In Pasadena, Calif., a downtown shopping district that until a few years ago was a deserted near-slum is now crowded with shoppers and strolling visitors, attracted by an exciting mix of shops, restaurants and two multiplex theatres. On one side of the street is a six-screen theatre operated by United Artists. In "One Colorado," a new center that helped kick off the area's revival, is an AMC theatre.

In San Francisco, the long-established Embarcadero Center recently added a four-screen cinema. Retail shops had enjoyed excellent daytime business five days a week, but were dead on weekends and during evening hours. Since the theatres opened, all that has changed. Many of the stores have extended their hours, and one key tenant, the B. Dalton bookstore, actually relocated from a prime ground floor spot to a second floor location to be closer to the traffic flow of theatre patrons.

One of the earliest examples of cinema-as-anchor is the United Artists seven-plex in the Horton Plaza in San Diego, which opened in the early 1980s. It was at one end of the retail spine, and on the upper level, so theatre patrons had to walk through most of the mall to get there. Horton Plaza has been a phenomenal success as a result of the crowds drawn by the theatres, who shop or eat before or after their movie. This success has spilled over into the entire surrounding area, bringing about a rebirth of a once-decaying downtown. As for ticket sales, the fact that the number of screens has since been doubled to 14 would suggest that UA is also happy with the results.

This is hardly an only-in-America phenomenon. In 1993 we at Kaplan/McLaughlin/Diaz (KMD) were approached by AMC to design their first cinema project in Asia—a 13-screen multiplex in a spectacular $1.4 billion retail development in Fukuoka, Japan, called Canal City Hakata. Today, although open only a short time, the Canal City Hakata multiplex is selling more than 25,000 tickets a week, and the retailers in the center report that sales and crowds are beyond even their most optimistic projections. Once again, the result was a revitalized district in what had been a somewhat run-down part of the city.

Other retail-cinema centers in Japan are becoming equally popular. Warner Bros. has formed a joint venture with Japanese retailer Nichii Co., Ltd., which today operates nine Warner Mycal cinemas (also designed by KMD) located in or adjacent to shopping centers. In many cases the cinema is a revitalizing element for a shopping center in need of help.

The cinema-as-anchor is just as successful in other parts of the world. In Bangkok, the huge Secon Square shopping center has as one of its anchors a 12-screen Golden Village multiplex. Its success can be measured by the fact that a nearby shopping center with no entertainment anchor, completed less than a year before Secon Center opened, is now virtually empty. In Cairo, KMD has found an emerging market for cinema-anchored retail developments. Our first cinema project there, a six-plex near Cairo, sits atop a new retail mall, becoming the traffic generator for the entire complex.

What's fascinating about all these projects, both in the United States and abroad, is the key role played by movie theatres in the success of the entire complex. In the past, we have tended to think of theatres as a beneficiary of mall traffic. In fact, however, it is clearly the other way around. Stores and restaurants prosper because of the presence of the silver screens.

The most often-cited example of the "urban entertainment center" is Citywalk, created by MCA and located right next to its Universal Studios theme park in Los Angeles. This exciting agglomeration of impulse retail, trendy restaurants and a 20-screen Cineplex Odeon multiplex has enjoyed unparalleled success from opening day.

Until recently, however, no one seems to have thought of imitating Citywalk elsewhere. The reason is that conventional wisdom attributed Citywalk's success to its location, right on the pathway between the parking garages for Universal Studios and the entrance to the theme park itself. Citywalk obviously was the beneficiary of a guaranteed traffic generator that existed nowhere else. But when KMD got involved in the initial planning of the second phase of Citywalk, our studies found that fully 80 percent of its visitors came solely to visit Citywalk, and never went to the theme park.

What we are now finding is that urban entertainment centers are being planned or built in many other parts of the country, from Irvine Spectrum in Orange County, Calif., where Edwards has a 21-screen multiplex plus Imax theatre, to Coco Walk, near Miami, Fla., where AMC is the multiplex operator.

Why is there such powerful synergy between movie theatres and their neighboring retail stores and restaurants? The answers involve everything from basic human psychology to the practicalities of parking and traffic flows.

A recent study done at a midwestern shopping center with a 14-screen multiplex shows just how good the retail/cinema fit really is. The study, reported in Shopping Center Business magazine, is based on surveys conducted during every screening at every theatre between Thanksgiving and Christmas of 1996, and again during March of 1997. It found that the only time when parking demands for shopping and theatregoing rise simultaneously is between 1 p.m. and 5 p.m. on Saturdays. But peak demand for theatre parking is still after 6 p.m., when shoppers typically are not out in force.

What is it about the mix of film entertainment, retail and restaurants that makes for such a reliable formula for success?

Part of the explanation is that our attitude toward shopping has changed. In the first few decades after World War II, when American consumers were still getting accustomed to the notion of consumer abundance, the shopping was itself a form of entertainment. We went to the store—and soon to the mall—as much for the fun of browsing as for the practical need to purchase something.

But today's adults, and certainly their teenage sons and daughters, are no longer dazzled by even the most elaborately displayed merchandise. Shopping has again become a chore. Many consumers have reverted to "target" shopping, where they drive to a mall, run in to pick up a few pre-selected items, and head back to their cars.

When Louis Harris & Associates asked Americans to rank their 10 favorite leisure activities, women rated shopping as tenth. It didn't even make the list for men. Most of us no longer have lots of spare time to spend browsing. Back in 1950, for example, only about a third of all women were earning paychecks. Today that percentage has doubled, and is even higher for women over 35. Men are also busier than ever. But in 85 percent of American homes, the shopping is still done by women; they are about 73 percent of mall shoppers, according to the Mass Retail Association.

When women and men do make time to shop, they like the experience to be enjoyable.

"ONE" WAY OR ANOTHER: The AMC-anchored One Colorado in Pasadena, Calif., has helped increased business in all the neighboring stores.

In the past, we have tended to think of theatres as a beneficiary of mall traffic. In fact, however, it is clearly the other way around.

It's no accident that the most successful retailers work hard to make their store environments entertaining.

While young consumers are the core of the movie market, there are plenty of older ticket buyers. In the Louis Harris survey's question about favorite leisure activities, going to the movies was tenth on the list for men, and seventh for women.

What is different about the younger movie audience is that it is heavily influenced by TV, electronic games and other high-impact forms of entertainment. They are drawn to movies, especially in a multiplex setting, because the theatre offers them a constantly fresh selection of entertainment experiences. Everything else in a shopping center—the architecture, the merchandise on display, the restaurant menus—is comparatively static. A multiplex theatre can provide a completely different entertainment experience every day. That's a powerful tool to generate return visits.

Why, then, are restaurants the third vital element of a successful urban entertainment center? It's not as if heavy exposure to Nintendo and the Internet results in an uncontrollable appetite for café latte or tiramisu. The real appeal of many of these trendy food spots is social; people go for the companionship, not the croissants. Our urbanized and anonymous communities offer fewer opportunities to simply meet and mingle. Many Americans are starved for the kind of casual socializing that once was commonplace in town squares, and that still is in European plazas. Restaurants in an entertainment-oriented retail center are an ideal setting for relaxing with friends and for people-watching.

The combination of retail, food and cinemas is a powerful formula for success. The best example of what it can mean, both for the center itself and for its community, is the aforementioned One Colorado in Pasadena. A lovely city best known for the annual Rose Parade, Pasadena's old retail core along Colorado Boulevard had by the 1970s become a near-slum of decrepit brick buildings. Shoppers avoided the district, and nearby residential areas were falling into decline. That began to change with the development of the retail-and-entertainment complex that opened in the early 1990s. One Colorado was designed by KMD to preserve the elegant brick facades that lined the boulevard while creating a modern shopping center.

A street that once mixed a handful of struggling shops among long-vacant buildings now has retailers and eateries like Banana Republic, J. Crew, Barnes & Noble, Blockbuster, The Gap, Victoria's Secret, The Cheesecake factory and dozens of other national names, along with an estimated 200 local and regional names.

The success of the center has spilled over into nearby streets. In all, the district now has more than a million square feet of stores, restaurants and movie theatres. Rents have soared to $4 per square foot. Sales tax revenues to the city top $1 million a year.

The most significant part of the One Colorado story is that there is nothing unique about its success. There are scores of smaller cities all across America whose aging downtowns could be dramatically revitalized by a well-planned entertainment retail center. The same basic approach could be applied with equal success to blighted or declining neighborhoods in our largest cities.

The movie theatre is a critically important ingredient for these revitalization projects. They are often the difference between success and failure. This gives theatre operators a powerful incentive to get actively involved in the planning of these centers from the earliest possible stage. It also provides a strong position from which to make sure that developers, local politicians and other tenants understand the theatre's key contribution to the center and to the community.

ATTACK OF THE PURLOINING REVISIONISTS

by Paul R. Maracin

The dark, disturbing 1932 Warner Bros. film "I Am a Fugitive From a Chain Gang" has one of the more memorable closing scenes in movie history. Portraying an escaped convict, Paul Muni is asked how he lives. His response: "I steal."

The same could be said of some current filmmakers who, bereft of original ideas, have leaned toward remakes and sequels. In doing so, they are pilfering titles and characterizations of proven winners, but in the process more often than not they have unconscionably butchered the story line. Already consigned to cinematic oblivion, the unlamented "The Scarlet Letter" is a prime example of when to leave well enough alone. The author's message was not only altered but obliterated. Nathaniel Hawthorne's novel previously had been given three screen treatments, all credible. The first was a 1926 silent with Lillian Gish; next came a 1934 sound version starring Colleen Moore. There was a German production in 1973, with English subtitles, directed by Wim Wenders.

In Hawthorne's novel, the transgressors who flouted the mores of 17th-century New England were punished. Screenwriter Douglas Day Stewart and director Roland Joffe had other ideas, however, and as a consequence their 1995 release evoked derisive guffaws from film observers. Instead of a grim scene at the scaffold (which would have made for great theatre), their "Scarlet Letter" had adulteress Hester Prynne riding off into the sunset with her ecclesiastical impregnator, Reverend Arthur Dimmesdale. Shades of a Gene Autry "B" western, with Gene warbling "I'm back in the saddle again."

On the subject of remakes, producer Arnold Kopelson has said, "There's a shortage of good projects. You see some of these great movies, with well-thought-out story lines, and they offer a very fertile area." Can we now look forward to a spate of remakes? There are all kinds of outstanding stories out there that could be mutilated if the goal is to scrap the author's unsettling denouement. John Steinbeck aficionados might cringe on speculating what Tinseltown revisionists would do with "Of Mice and Men." We can see it now: Instead of taking matters into his own hands and shooting Lennie so as to spare him from extrajudicial vengeance, George takes the money he has been saving to buy their own farm and hires legal counsel. The canny lawyer convinces a jury that Lennie did not kill Curley's wife and that he was in fact a victim of police conspiracy.

Current filmmakers, bereft of original ideas, have leaned toward remakes and sequels. In doing so, they are pilfering titles and butchering proven story lines.

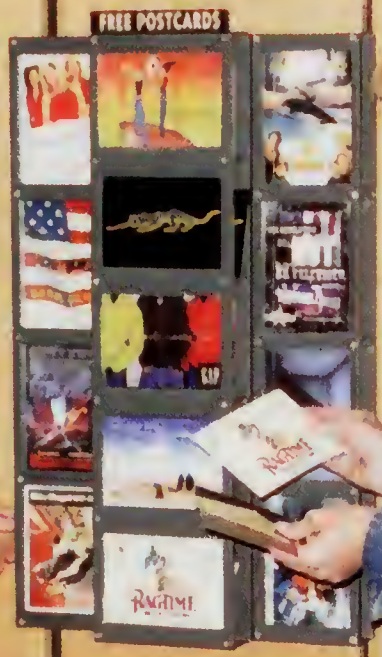
Who can forget the dramatic finale in the David O. Selznick screen version of "A Tale of Two Cities," Charles Dickens' novel set in the period of the French revolution? Sydney Carton (Ronald Colman) is led to the guillotine, nobly accepting death after changing places with Charles Darnay. As the camera slowly ascends skyward, we hear Colman's somber voice intone: "It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

Those moving words are straight from the pen of Dickens, but obviously the old master wordsmith had no idea of how to bring a story to a satisfactory conclusion. Director Jack Conway and Colman should have known better. But that can be remedied. In a new version, the guillotine malfunctions, and in the ensuing confusion Carton escapes into the crowd with the aid of a conniving warder. He subsequently resurfaces, with a new identity as Master of Ceremonies at Folies-Bergere.

And there's "Gone With the Wind." Surely the current breed of screenwriters can better Margaret Mitchell's bland ending. In the faithful adaptation of the book, Rhett (Clark Gable) bids adieu to Scarlett (Vivien Leigh) in the famous front-door take in which he recites the line of frankly not giving a damn. This must be changed; it's too tame for today's sated audiences. In the remake, we can have Rhett excoriate Scarlett with a string of expletives (almost obligatory in present-day scenarios), and some film critics will doubtless acclaim this as "unfettered dialogue." Not to be outdone—and relegated to second-class citizenry—Scarlett with reply in kind, and you can be sure she won't use the innocuous interjection "fiddle-de-dee!" As the two exchange vulgarities at the doorway, Rhett suddenly has a change of heart; he sweeps Scarlett off her feet and dashes up the stairway with her in his arms in a reprise of an earlier scene. The film ends as the bedroom door slams shut. Then again, some filmmakers would likely insist the door remain open. Well, whatever sells.

What has precipitated the trend toward remakes and sequels? Writing for The New York Times News Service, Bernard Weinraub quoted one Hollywood producer who had this to say about contemporary decision-makers in the film industry: "Creative executives are young, inexperienced people who have gone to the same schools, wear the same clothes, drive the same cars, eat in the same places, are way in over their heads, and have no life experience other than television."

For affirmation of this development, we need only consider New Line Cinema's planned remake of "The Women." The Clare Boothe stage hit was adapted for the screen in 1939 by Anita Loos and Jane Murfin, with the uncredited assistance of Donald Ogden Stewart. The script for the remake, which is in preproduction, is being written and "updated" by Diane English. Her claim to fame? She created TV's "Murphy Brown."



And are you ready for this? Time Warner has announced plans to produce a sequel to "Casablanca." If Claude Rains were around today, his reaction would probably be: "I'm shocked. Shocked!"

IT STARTS WITH NATO

NATO's Training Tapes Are Invaluable to Circuits on the Grow

by Michael Payne

Mary Ann Grasso, NATO

Barry Myers, AMC

Employees come and go—that's a fact of life for the theatre owner. High employee turnover, while not without certain financial advantages, has a major downside: training. As new employees arrive on a regular basis, teaching these new hires their jobs can become a full-time job in itself.

How do theatres combat this training problem? "The larger theatre circuits often produce their own training films and materials," says Jeff Logan, president of Logan Luxury Theatres. "But the smaller guys like us don't have the money or the resources to do it ourselves."

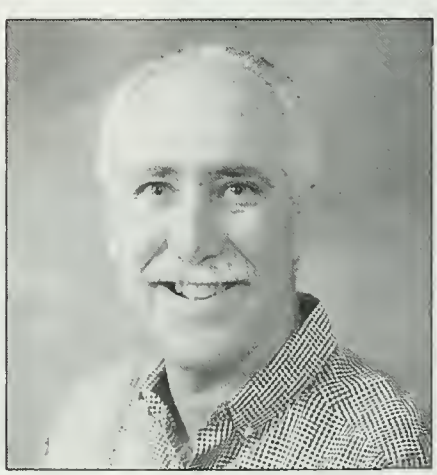
That's where the National Association of Theatre Owners (NATO) comes in. Spurred on by the need for such training materials by smaller theatre circuits—as well as interest from the larger circuits for more comprehensive training tools—NATO decided to produce a nine-tape video training series for theatre employees, entitled "It Starts With You!" (see accompanying reviews, p. 98). "Our goal was to make a training tape series that set a level standard for theatre employee functions," says Mary Ann Grasso, executive director of NATO. "This allows a consistency within our industry to present an entertaining and enjoyable moviegoing experience."

Grasso began the ambitious project by putting together a committee of contributors from both the smaller theatres chains and the giants. Logan notes, "The committee was specifically made up of representatives from circuits of all sizes. Barry Myers [international corporate training manager] of AMC represented the big guys, Maureen McNamara [training director] of Landmark represented the middle, and John Saag [vice president] of Associated Theatres of Kentucky and myself represented the smaller circuits. The whole point was to come up with something that every theatre will be able to utilize."

Working so closely with "competitors" proved to be illuminating. "As the little guy," says Logan, "I was impressed by how open and responsive the bigger guys were." Saag agrees, saying "I was a little apprehensive going into this, but everybody jelled together. It was truly a collaborative effort."

McNamara was also impressed by the teamwork. "It was an incredible experience, working together in such a cooperative environment," she recalls. "We had some very intensive conference calls, going over scripts, outlining stuff...but it was amazing to me how much time and energy each company put into the project, how they saw the value of it." Myers adds, "It was a lot of fun and the process went extremely smoothly. I made some very good friends."

Foremost on the committee's minds was creating a training tool that would be informative without being boring. "It wasn't just the knowledge," explains Logan. "I mean, we all work in theatres, we know how things work. But it was the way to present that knowledge that was the challenge. You throw a manual in front of someone and they fall asleep. So that's why we decided to make a film, one that was entertaining and informative at the same time."



To help them decide just how "It Starts With You!" would be structured, the committee looked to an obvious source: "We collected other training tapes and materials from the major theatre circuits," Logan states. AMC, Regal, UATC and Cineplex all graciously donated their own training videos for the committee to view. "We watched so many tapes," recalls McNamara, "and we intently tried to learn from each one of those. We sort of took the best from the best."

To produce the actual filming, the NATO committee chose Metro Productions of Kansas City, Mo., which previously produced commercials and training films for such companies as Wal-Mart, Blockbuster Video, and Toyota Motor Corp. Scott Henson and Roger Hull, two writer/directors for Metro, worked in collaboration to organize the shooting scripts and direct the nine tapes in the series.

"What I brought to the table," says Henson, "was my experience shooting in theatres when they're open." Because NATO didn't have the budget to build an entire theatre set, they decided to shoot "on location" in an actual theatre. Barry Myers of AMC got permission to use the AMC Independence Commons in Kansas City. "Because [AMC's] home office is here in Kansas City," Myers states, "the Independence Commons is accustomed to such unusual requests." Myers also helped coordinate other production materials, such as the theatre uniforms that were to be the "costumes" for the project. But, in order for the tapes to be useful for all theatre chains, Myers didn't use specific AMC uniforms. "Obviously, we had to make the tapes generic as far as brand identity," he points out.

By all accounts, it was a hectic shoot. "We filmed all nine of them in two weeks," states Mary Ann Grasso with pride. "I can't even believe we got through it." It was no small feat, considering that each of the nine segments averages 10 minutes in length—that's the equivalent of a feature-length project in merely 14 days. To help speed up the shoot, director Henson didn't film in sequence. "It was crazy," he recalls with a laugh. "It's Tuesday morning, and you have to shoot every scene in that location for all nine films—then let the editor figure it all out later."

Perhaps the toughest—and ultimately most rewarding—production decision occurred before the actual filming: choosing the actor "hosts" of the video series. "In order to maintain a sense of continuity through all nine films," informs Grasso, "we decided to have the same two actors host every segment."

"We wanted to find people who were dynamic and fun," says McNamara, "but could still carry the [training techniques] in a lively and professional way." To that end, director Henson began with a casting call in Los Angeles.

"I flew out, auditioned the best picks in person, and put those auditions on tape," he explains. The NATO committee then reviewed the audition tapes, after which they easily chose stage actress Heidi Gott (who is currently touring with "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" play) and Sci-Fi Channel regular Roger Lodge to be the hosts of "It Starts With You!"

"The two of them just jumped out and off the screen for us," McNamara says. "We all thought there was really only one choice. It was interesting how the committee all agreed." Logan was also very pleased. "I think we really got lucky with them; they had amazing chemistry together. I think they're real finds. They have a banter that is humorous and entertaining, which is what we want, based on the target audience."

Director Henson concurs. Knowing that the target audience—teenagers—are turned-off by ultra-serious, documentary-style filmmaking, Henson attempted to make good use of the hosts' comic abilities, aiming for a light-hearted and humorous approach. "If the employees get bored with the tapes and don't watch them, they're useless," Henson stressed. "If you don't make them entertaining, you've wasted your time."

Seeing the finished product, the NATO committee all agree that their time was anything but wasted. McNamara feels "It Starts With You!" is a godsend to mid-sized theatre circuits like Landmark. "We're growing to the point of needing training programs that focus on enhancing the overall presentation of our business. But [by ourselves] we really couldn't afford to do something like this." Saag agrees. "For me, as a small circuit, I have got to believe this is the best thing NATO has done for the small operators," he states. "Despite all the great things [NATO] has done in the past, this is the tool I can use the most. This is how you run a theatre."

THE TALE OF THE TAPE

BOXOFFICE Reviews the NATO Training Tape Series

Each of the nine videos in the NATO Training Tape Series "It Starts With You!" covers a different aspect of theatre operations. Without exception, all the tapes (each around 10 minutes long) are expertly produced, humorously involving, and jam-packed with valuable training information. What follows are short reviews of each segment.

"Orientation: It's in Your Hands"

The first tape in the series, "Orientation" points out how the "magic of the movies" has much to do with the skills and attitudes of the theatre employees. The tape outlines the various job positions and how they interact, thereby stressing the importance of teamwork and why learning such work ethics can only help out the new employee in the future. In this way, the tape can also be useful as a recruiting tool, even explaining that many famous filmmakers once began their careers as movie theatre employees.

"Boxoffice: First Impression"

This tape stresses that because the boxoffice attendant is the first theatre employee the customer meets, he or she plays a key role in creating an enjoyable moviegoing experience. It's explained through demonstrations exactly how the attendant should act (utilizing eye contact and smiling but remaining businesslike, for example) and how to keep a clean, well-organized boxoffice. The tape even shows how to spot a counterfeit bill.

"The Usher: You're the Host"

It's pointed out that the usher is really the "host" of the theatre, and therefore should impart a fun-spirited attitude to the customers, setting the mood for the evening's enjoyment. The tape shows how to manage the movie crowds, keep the lobby clean and safe, and, most importantly, how to deal with difficult customers without losing one's cool.

"Concessions: The Difference Is You"

The focus here is that the main difference between the movie experience at a theatre and at home is the concession stand, and therefore it's important to provide fast, friendly and accurate service. There are even sales tips on how to reel the customers in and get them to purchase more than they wanted.

"Film Presentation: Presentation Is Everything"

Designed mostly for projectionists, this video reviews standard practices of the trade. It's more technical in content than the other tapes, and appropriately so. It points out daily operating procedures, how to check sound and picture quality, and includes the "Five Golden Rules" of film projection. It also contains an extensive troubleshooting section that is valuable to both new and experienced projectionists.

"Safety and Security: Accident and Incident"

Through step-by-step demonstrations, this tape shows many various emergencies that commonly occur and how to deal with them. It stresses the importance of not admitting guilt and/or liability. There's a good primer on how to avoid crime, and what to do should a crime take place. The tape also explains how to handle the bigger, not-so-common emergencies, such as a tornado warning or even a fire.

"Serving Patrons with Special Needs: Dignity and Respect"

"Never touch a customer's wheelchair without asking first" is only one of the many lessons in this important behavioral guideline on how to treat the handicapped and the elderly. As the title indicates, the tape stresses "dignity and respect." It demonstrates the various service accommodations (such as assistive listening devices) that exist to help make the moviegoing experience more enjoyable for those with special needs.

"Sexual Harassment: Don't Cross the Line"

Perhaps the most important tape in the series, "Don't Cross the Line" does an admirably accurate job of pointing out exactly where the line falls. Although the tape is aimed at young adults in the theatre industry—explaining that rules of conduct differ between school and work—this video could benefit any employee in any workplace.

"Ratings: Informed Decisions"

Unavailable for viewing at press time, the tape focuses on the MPAA ratings system and its value to moviegoers.—Michael Payne

Our outgoing BOXOFFICE European correspondent on the state of the Continent by Melissa Morrison

For the last 18 months, BOXOFFICE has had the great good fortune of providing page space to Melissa Morrison, our European correspondent, formerly stationed in Prague, and one of the most talented young commentators to come our way in some time.

Melissa recently resettled back in her native country, the U.S. Her commitment to the readership of BOXOFFICE was such that she immediately proposed the following article—a kind of debriefing of what she learned about the European market as she pounded our journalistic beat. As a thumbnail sketch of across-the-board trends and developments, it may be one of the most useful articles we've ever run.

Readers interested in the exhibition scene are also directed to our July "Giants of International Exhibition Directory" and its accompanying tables—all of which were compiled by Melissa. As for Ms. Morrison, all of us at BOXOFFICE *would like to take this opportunity to publicly thank her for a job well and imaginatively done. We look forward to regular appearances of her byline in our pages.—Editor

A quick game of "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon" encapsulates the current state of Europe's cinema industry. The object of the game, which was popularized by some of the wackier elements on the Internet, is to link any actor or film personality to randomly selected pop culture icon Kevin Bacon in six "moves" (i.e., direct links) or less. So: Nikita Michalkov to Kevin Bacon. Ready? Go!

Michalkov, the Oscar-winning Russian star and director of 1994's "Burnt By the Sun," is currently making "The Barber of Siberia" with Julia Ormond, who was the female lead in "Legends of the Fall," which also starred Brad Pitt, who was in "Sleepers" opposite Kevin Bacon! And with two degrees to spare.

That actors hailing from the two countries whose Cold War antagonism was responsible for Sylvester Stallone's entire '80s oeuvre can now be linked by a drinking game says a lot about Europe's industry in the '90s. The German guy downing a Lowenbrau in a Munich pub is more likely than ever to have seen mainstream American films like "Sleepers" and "Legends," thanks to the multiplexes that have mushroomed up around the continent. As for European movies, Michalkov isn't the only foreign filmmaker using Western actors and filming in English; he's just part of Europe's bid to challenge Hollywood by pooling resources and targeting international audiences. The fall of communism in the former East bloc has opened up a promising new market for all aspects of the industry. Somewhere in Hollywood, Bacon's agent must be smiling.

MUCH TWO MUCH: A bomb in the U.S., the Antonio Banderas-Melanie Griffith-starring "Two Much" was a smash in Spain, demonstrating the wisdom of international co-financing arrangements.

Multiplexity

Non-European companies currently lead the multiplex revolution. The British journal Screen Digest credits the European multiplex wave to the American companies Warner Bros. and United Cinemas International (UCI), the latter of which is a joint venture between Universal, MGM and Paramount studios. These companies first arrived in the mid-to late-'80s to supplement their distribution arms, and have been expanding steadily: Each has built approximately 260 more screens since 1990.

AMC has dipped a tentative toe into the market, starting with Spain and Portugal, while Australia's Village Roadshow has announced one of the most ambitious campaigns in exhibition history: 2,000 more screens worldwide by the end of the century, including sites in virtually untapped Italy and Greece. Since neither AMC nor Village has distribution concerns in Europe, their execs obviously feel exhibition alone is a fruitful enterprise.

Bets are on the United Kingdom for the distinction of becoming the first European country to reach screen saturation. It will take at least another year, however, according to industry observers. Among the companies helping to achieve that goal is Cine-UK, formed explicitly to build multiplexes in Britain. Run by former Warner Bros. International head Stephen M. Wiener, an American, the company's corporate strategy is to build in family-entertainment areas that include such features as bowling alleys and pizza restaurants, particularly in places overlooked by established circuits. Virgin/MGM is another maverick, with its concept of high-grade theatres, complete with special areas featuring a private bar and waitress service. Virgin plans 37 multiplex sites, which will make it the country's biggest multiplex chain.

As BOXOFFICE reported in July, France remains one of the most-closed countries to foreign exhibitors (see article "Pas De Deux," BOXOFFICE vol. 133, no. 7, July 1997). Its dominant cinema-operators—Gaumont, Pathe and UGC—also operate distribution and production arms, triple-twine against outside invaders. Another obstacle is legislation limiting new theatres to 2,000 seats, a response to fears that suburban megaplexes will suck cinema-goers out of city centers.

The Netherlands is an example of a country that, albeit tiny, has tremendous boxoffice potential, with residents currently averaging a low one trip per person annually to the cinema.

Other countries that top circuits are beginning to mine are those of Eastern Europe—primarily Hungary—and Southern Europe. Italy is one of Europe's largest markets—admissions in '95 were 91.4 million—despite several hindrances: It's underscreened, and the traditional cinema-going season lasts only 10 months. Spain is tapped for a growth spurt in virtually all areas of its film industry. Admissions have soared by 20 million since 1988, exceeding 100 million in 1996, but its attendance rate is still considered small. A clutch of exhibition companies, both local and foreign, have swooped in to change that, including Spain's Lauren Film; a collaboration among Warner Bros., Spain's PRISA and Portugal's Lusomundo; and AMC International.

The burgeoning free-market economies of Eastern Europe have attracted capitalists of all stripes, and cinema circuits are no exception. Hungary is the site of the most activity. Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon chose the capital, Budapest, for its first European multiplex. CEO and President Allen Karp said Hungary's strong economy, stable government and central location in Eastern Europe made it attractive. Odeon's next intended sites, besides Italy, are also Eastern and Central Europe: Germany, Austria, Poland, and the Czech Republic. The Australian exhibition giant Village Roadshow also built a Budapest cinema in a joint venture and plans three more over the next two years.

Spreading the Joy

Exhibition and distribution are closely linked in Europe. The United Kingdom has the greatest concentration of ownership and the greatest degree of integration between the two sectors, according to the British Film Institute. So much so, in fact, that in 1994 the government's Monopolies and Mergers Commission investigated. It concluded that, indeed, the major U.S. distributors, as well as such domestic ones as Entertainment, First Independent, and Guild and Rank constituted a complex monopoly in distribution, but said such a formation wasn't hurting anyone. Even so, U.K. distributors face a tough market: huge media and marketing costs and a screen shortage. As a result, a lot of majors let U.S. movies go straight to video there.

France's vertically integrated sector bolsters the country's strong loyalty to its own movies. It's also the only non-English-speaking country that routinely subtitles its foreign films rather than dubs them. The annual September festival at Deauville generates a lot of coverage for U.S. films, so most distributors wait till then to release their biggest American movies.

Distribution of Italian films abroad has declined hugely in recent years—by 80 percent, according to one estimate. Hope for the industry as a whole is pinned on the new deputy prime minister who oversees film, Walter Veltroni. In terms of exhibition, he is expected to get an agreement from multiplex operators to establish domestic quotas, thus improving the chances for domestic films' distribution. In smaller countries such as the Netherlands, distributors must compete with too many prints on too few screens. As a result, releases are stratified into art-house movies and blockbusters, with middle-budget films getting squeezed out of the cinemas.

MAKING WAVES: "Breaking the Waves" had it all: Danish director, Scottish set, French backing, English actors and international acclaim.

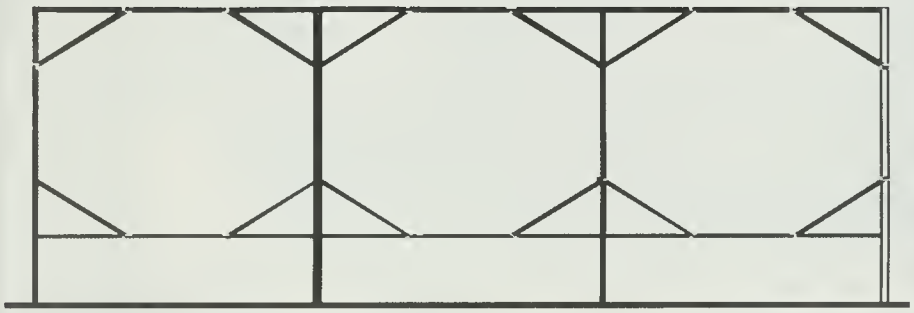
Admission Positions

The English, German and French are Europe's most avid cinema-goers. Britons, for example, are expected to buy 130 million movie tickets in 1997, an increase of five percent over the previous year. American blockbusters like "Independence Day"are credited with juicing up European cinema-going. Some countries have also experienced a renaissance with domestic films. Germany, for example, experienced a domestic revival in 1996 with a string of comedies, one of which, "Werner Das Muss Kesseln!", was the most popular movie of the year after "ID4," earning a zer gut $31 million. According to the Media Salles yearbook, a publication of the European Union and Italy, such low-budget comedies have catapulted the market share of domestic product to its current level of 19.5 percent—almost twice the usual.

Though summer is America's blockbuster season, that's when Europeans traditionally stay out of cinemas. (Southern Europe's summer-only outdoor theatres are an exception.) Some exhibitors and distributors are targeting this weak spot by banding together and launching media campaigns and discounts designed to entice people into cinemas, such as the German distributors' 1996 initiative, "Der Sommerhit: Kino." The $20 million campaign focused on U.S. and German films.

An effect of a summer vacation from the movies is an autumn glut. In '95, there was one big opening (250 to 350 screens) in major territories every week between August and October. Distributors rush to circulate their accumulated surplus of American blockbusters, typically resulting in shorter runs of two to three weeks, half the time conventional wisdom says is necessary for a film to maximize its earning potential.



Home Movies

U.K. producers do better than any other European country, because they share a language with the world's most rabid filmgoers, the Americans. Even so, that's not a lot of flicks: Only one to four films annually make back their productions costs. And that's only films that manage to get a distributor. The Arts Council's National Lottery Fund helped films reach production, dedicating $41 million for 35 projects from September '95 to December '96. Up to 150 films could be launched by the council's "studio" franchise initiative, which could revolutionize the British industry with the largest handout ever: $65.4 million for each franchise, spread over six years.

The German success with local comedies bodes well for its industry, while France has long been protective of its films and nurtured them accordingly. Other countries are not as fortunate. The tradition of government-subsidized films is ending. Spain and Italy have reduced subsidies to a trickle. Italy hopes new minister Veltroni makes good on his promise to compensate with tax changes that encourage private investment in production. Meanwhile, Spain found an answer in co-productions with the Americans: "Two Much," starring Spanish heartthrob Antonio Banderas and American Melanie Griffith, earned $1.3 million in its 1995 opening, eventually becoming the most successful domestic film of all time.

Eastern Europe's domestic cinema is one of the casualties of emerging capitalism—albeit a temporary one. The governments can't afford subsidies, while newborn private production companies are struggling to gain a foothold. For example, in the Czech Republic, Oscar-winning "Kolya" aside, production has fallen from 40 to 50 features annually to 20.

CZECH-ING UP: Despite the Oscar-winning "Kolya," the East bloc remains under-financed and in a post-Communist slump, with production fall-off running as high as 60 percent in the last 10 years.

Two are Better Than One

Increasingly, European countries are working together, pooling their resources in order to compete with Hollywood's products. "The Ogre," the 1996 film by Germany's Volker Schlondorff, is but one example: Its German, French and British co-producers amassed $17.7 million, hired an international star (American John Malkovich), and made the movie in English—clearly with an eye for an audience beyond its producing countries.

The United States is also getting into the act. In late 1995, the American Film Marketing Association (AFMA) signed an agreement with Nederlandse Vereniging van Speelfilmproducenten (NVS), the Dutch film producers' association, to collaborate on English-language movies. It marked the first private-sector agreement between European and American trade associations.

One of the most interesting trends in European co-production is the partnering of Western European countries—typically better-funded—with not-so-well-funded Eastern European countries. Turkey is an example: In 1994, the government suspended subsidies for filmmakers—unfortunate timing, since production had reached an all-time low of 11 films the previous year. However, domestic production has started to improve thanks to European co-productions such as the 1995 Spain/Netherlands/Turkey collaboration "Istanbul Under My Wings," with support from Eurimages, a Council of Europe funding program. The film was one of the most successful in Turkey in a decade.

Americans Abroad

American studios and independents have spread their reach further over the Continent, tapping into local productions as well as intensifying their distribution of European products. Britain and the United States have long held a special distributing relationship. The United Kingdom, however, has never had a hotter market for its independent distributors than today's America, as the 1997 Oscar nominations signaled.

Miramax and Gramercy are among the most loyal patrons. Miramax Films has committed to the production of films by establishing an outpost in London, from which it helped finance the Sundance-shown "Brassed Off" and others. Fox Searchlight fully financed "The Full Monty," which also premiered at Sundance. These companies' participation in British filmmaking shows confidence in the commercial prospects of U.K. films.

But American companies are also making further inroads into non-English-speaking countries, including Italy and Germany. In Germany, for example, the local distribution branch of Buena Vista International launched a new production arm from which to back domestic projects. Buena Vista Production plans to produce four to six pictures in 1997 with local partners. Disney and Warner Bros. have also collaborated on local productions, while Fox and Columbia are reportedly interested in doing likewise.

The Wild East

The first multiplexes in former Soviet-bloc countries have had a dramatic effect, reviving film attendance that had dived sharply since 1989's domino-style revolutions. Openings in Hungary, the Czech Republic and Poland in 1996 jolted attendance figures. Poland's Kino Femina, for example, attracted 61,000 ticket-buyers in its first month—nearly twice what all other local cinemas combined drew in total.

Needless to say, the former Soviet bloc is ripe for an exhibition invasion. Of all the viable Eastern European countries, Russia, with its vast population and burgeoning, if uneven, development of a leisure class, seems the most neglected. Only one local company, Golden Ring, has announced plans to build a chain of multiplexes across the country. Russia's first multiplex, the Kodak Kino Mir, opened promisingly in Moscow in 1996.

Finnkino, Finland's exhibition/distribution giant, has crossed the Baltic to become No. 1 in Latvia's developing market. Finnkino discovered it can raise prices in Latvia's still-struggling economy, and plans to pioneer the first multiplex in the capital, Riga. Lithuania and Estonia are also being eyed for development by the Scandinavian countries, whose languages and customs are similar.

All Together Now

The dissolution of borders between countries is intended to make the continent a unified economic force. In doing so, European union will address one of the primary weaknesses of European cinema: the fact that no single country has the budget or audience to compete with the Americans. The merging of boundaries has raised fears among some filmmakers that national identities will be diluted, as in 21 chefs making one soup. Optimists point to films such as Lars von Trier's "Breaking the Waves:" Danish director, Scottish set, French backing, English actors—and international acclaim.

The European Union's formal program for developing a pan-European industry is called MEDIA. The program, which has $310 million ECU (US$353 million) to spend, is open to the 15 member states of the EU. Some of its outreach extends, via the organization Audiovisual Eureka, toward countries in the former Soviet bloc. The current program, which ends in the year 2000, focuses on the wider distribution, development and screening of films, and professional training programs. A separate pan-European organization, Eurimages, has similar programs but is open to its 25 Council of Europe-member countries, many of which are not part of the EU. Since its founding in 1989, it has helped distribute, screen, and finance hundreds of films, including "Breaking the Waves" and "Kolya."

End Credits

The European market is currently in the throes of great changes as some of the most important events of the latter 20th century reverberate across the continent. The fall of communism and the unification of Europe, combined with one of the most revolutionary events in the history of the cinema industry—multiplexing—have created an era of unprecedented links between filmmakers, distributors, exhibitors and others. In other words, the industry is creating its own version of Six Degrees.

Kevin Bacon, we love you, man.

THE 'ART' OF ASHEVILLE

Entrepreneur John Cram Revives Art Theatre in North Carolina's All-American City

by Eric Gipson

PLAY IT AGAIN, CRAM: John Cram in front of the refurbished Fine Art Theatre on bustling Biltmore Avenue. The cinema has helped revitalize the downtown section of Asheville, N.C.

John Cram's grin—beaming of energy, enterprise and a sense of mischievous fun—has been well-known to the residents of Asheville, N.C., for 25 years. These days, his smile is particularly ebullient when he opens the door of the Fine Arts Theatre, the newly restored 51-year-old cinema on Biltmore Avenue, the city's main street.

In the mid '80s, few Asheville residents would have envisioned that the Fine Arts Theatre would make such an architectural and operational comeback. The cinema originally presented mainstream films and occasional vaudeville shows until 1960, when it began a 25-year stint as Asheville's adult theatre until closing in 1985. The resurrection of the cinema mirrors the rebirth that has taken place throughout the city, located in the Blue Ridge Mountains of North Carolina.

Asheville has always enjoyed a certain degree of renown: for its mountain scenery and four-season climate; as the inspiration for Thomas Wolfe's "Look Homeward Angel"; and as a getaway and retirement destination for the wealthy, literary and famous. More recently, the city has received a variety of national press: as winner of the All-American City title and as haven for everyone from New Age followers to businessmen escaping big-city life. Observing the city's upsurge in population and the downtown bustling with restaurants, galleries, shops and tourists, a first-time visitor would be hard-pressed to believe the locals who often say, "Ten years ago, one did not have to look both ways before crossing Biltmore Avenue." It has been an incredible transformation, most residents agree, that has been achieved through the vision and sweat of those who preceded the city's recent turnaround.

John arrived in 1972, newly graduated from the University of Wisconsin, and set up shop in South Asheville with some mugs, bowls and goblets. While his first month's earnings were $16.70, his New Morning Gallery would eventually gain regional prestige. Soon after, John set his sights on downtown Asheville. "I was always impressed by downtown Asheville's infrastructure, with its Art Deco buildings and history," he says. "It just didn't have enough people."

In 1989, John opened the Blue Spiral I gallery on Biltmore Avenue—now recognized as having been a major force in downtown Asheville's comeback. Adjacent to Blue Spiral I, however, was a space which tapped into a love John has held since a child. "Just what if...," he thought, looking at the shell of the empty Fine Arts Theatre.

"I've always loved film and studied it at the University," he says while munching on popcorn in the theatre's upstairs Critic's Lounge. "While I couldn't indulge that interest through managing the shops and gallery, I guess I infused latent theatre tendencies in my work—such as the idea of just putting on a good 'show' and naming Blue Spiral I after the monolith in '2001: A Space Odyssey.'" John also saw the need for a theatre of the right kind. "Despite the fact that this town was growing in so many ways, and was developing a progressive reputation, the fact was there were a lot of first-rate movies that were missing this town. So this enterprise had to be an extension of my art relationship to the community."

When John purchased the building for $100,000 in 1990, it seemed only the latest, yet hopeful chapter in the tired history of a building which served as a bittersweet memory for most residents. On October 24, 1946, the theatre opened as The Strand, with more than 1,000 customers turning out for the films "Let's Go Steady!" and "The Town Went Wild." In those days, the downstairs 200-seat cinema was for "Whites Only," and the black population was restricted to the upstairs 80-seat section until segregation ended in 1964. In 1960, the theatre began showing "nudist" films, such as "Nature's Paradise." ("See actual film shots of the World Naturist Congress!")

The theatre closed that year, reopened in 1962 (in the erotic genre), closed in 1963 due to a lack of first-run films, and, once more that year, reopened—again as an "adults-only" cinema.

Nudist films evolved into hard-core cinema (while the upstairs section shifted to showing gay films), and pornography was the theatre's hallmark from the late '60s until 1985, when tough obscenity laws ended a 30-year run of one of the two most common Asheville fibs: "The car has 20,000 miles" and "I've never been to the Fine Arts Theatre." The theatre was then rented out for concerts, plays and film screenings—and even saw a stint as home to the Asheville Metropolitan Church—before John purchased the building from the Community Arts Council. "When I purchased the theatre, a lot of the arts community thought, 'Let's make this happen right away and open it.'"

But John wanted to renovate the theatre properly and knew patience was a crucial factor. In 1990, Biltmore Avenue was home to abandoned buildings, but John had an intuitive feeling that—and he was not sure precisely when—better times would come for downtown Asheville. Thus, he took it slow with the building's renovation. The theatre was not a grand cinematic palace; however, its functional character had just enough subtle frills and retro appeal to inspire his creative eye.

TWO THUMBS UP: Customers enjoy the Fine Art's upstairs Critic's Lounge and bar—converted from the former manager's apartment.

After a bit of P.T. Barnum-ing with the bank, John secured funds to begin renovations which would total $650,000. He brought the building up to code and installed new seats, new carpets, new paint and new curtains, all coordinated in rich art deco color blends. There were some go-arounds—like taking out the wall which separated the upstairs balcony theatre to make a singular theatre, until learning that having a second upstairs theatre would be more profitable. And there were some opulent and very calculated refinements, one being the conversion of the previous management's apartment, located behind the upstairs theatre, into a "Critic's Lounge" complete with a bar. Operational and booking assistance came by way of Dick Morris, a Sarasota, Fla. agent whose company, Morris Productions, continues to book films for the Fine Arts Theatre. "Dick taught me much about the rhythm of showing a film and building an audience, i.e., if it's popular, then you need to hold it over. He's probably saved me several hundred thousand dollars." On the technical side, Frank Worthington, of Raleigh, N.C.-based Cinetech, installed new projectors and sound equipment. "Frank kind of camped out in Asheville and taught us novices the 60 steps, or what seems like 60 steps, of running the projector," says John. "I learned it, although I had not used that part of my head in a long time." By 1996, renovations were almost complete and downtown Asheville was thriving. Considering these factors, John knew it was time. D-Day was set for Friday, the 13th of December; H-Hour was 6:30 p.m. "The last seats were being installed at 6:05 p.m.," he adds.

On that cold, rainy and windy evening, a long line of patrons—including families, college students and adults of varying ages and tastes, from the terminally hip gallery crawlers to those who had not set foot in the theatre since 1959—streamed in to behold two classics: the restoration marvel of the Fine Arts Theatre and, onscreen, the beautiful and resplendent black-and-white love agony of Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman in "Casablanca." Showing in tandem was "Cinema Paradisio" (which John calls "a wonderful metaphor for the theatre's re-opening") and "Blade Runner."

"In the lobby after the show, people kept saying, 'Thank you, thank you,'" says John. "About all I could manage to do was say 'thank you' [back]—and then sit down for a good drink." Meanwhile, coworkers covertly saw to it that the Fine Arts marquee read, "Play it again, Cram." Titles have since included such films as "Shine," "Johns," "Brassed Off," "Pink Flamingos," "Ulee's Gold," classics like "Vertigo," and a strong offering of Shakespeare, including "Twelfth Night" and "Hamlet." "It's been a quality mix of first-run, independent, art and classic films," says John. "And now Asheville is getting them about the time they play in Charlotte and Raleigh, which is a good step for this town."

Multiplex cinemas in the Asheville suburbs pose some competition, John says, but not to any bothering point. "Sometimes, I lie awake at night and think, 'Ooh, if I had "Jurassic Park" I'd have full seats all the time,'" he says. "And, likewise, the 'plexes want films such as 'The English Patient' and 'Shine,' the latter of which I was able to get, and it did very well." But John never forgets his commitment to his format, or its advantages. "The 'plexes here tried to show 'Secrets and Lies' and no one went. I brought it back for a special engagement and it did three times as well. Sometimes, the art films can get lost out there if they're not in the right venue."

The feedback and satisfaction of his patrons have provided the ultimate balance sheet.

FINE ARTS THEATRE
Owner: John Cram
36 Biltmore Avenue
Asheville, NC 28801
(704) 232-1530

Earliest Movie Memory: "The Mummy" (1932)

Favorite Concession Item: "Popcorn—all the way to the bank!"

Favorite BOXOFFICE Feature: "All Independent Exhibition Showcases. It's instantly therapeutic to read about others who have the same dreams and challenges."

Advice to Other Independents: "Treat each day as a new opportunity to make an upbeat difference in people's lives, from the films you show to how you interact with your customers, staff and community."

"Now," says John, "we have people of all ages coming to almost every film because it's their clubhouse, where they want to see their friends."

The Fine Arts Theatre is also a feather in the cap for downtown Asheville. As the cinema does not have its own parking lot, it creates "a ripple in business community," John says, citing a nearby restaurant's doubling of receipts after the theatre opened. "If you park to go to a movie, you want to make it an evening and visit other businesses. People are willing to make a little bit more of an effort, to walk the block or two or three. It's starting to come together, to be what a city is supposed to be—a place where people gather together for a great variety of functions and socializing."

As with his gallery and shops, John plans a certain amount of hands-on tenacity until he is satisfied of the theatre's independent success. He's hired a manager and has a large part-time staff which he "pays a bit more than the industry norm, but I expect a bit more from them." With basic operations intact, he now wants to explore different promotion techniques, as in his faxing area colleges about "Looking for Richard" or using Asheville's abundant bed-and-breakfasts as a conduit.

John says he also plans to expand the theatre's lobby with a dessert bar. And he might consider use of the the Fine Arts Theatre stage. The restored stage recently got a trial run from a group of children who put on a school show—a show which went fine until some of the kids caused a small and harmless fire by putting the curtain over the floor lights. "I keep my hair short for a reason--so I can't pull it out," says John, laughing. "I've been having fun, but I'm obviously still learning."

A new twist on Oreo cookies and churros has been introduced by J & J Snack Foods Corp. The traditional churro has been enhanced with the chocolate cookie and cream filling of Oreo cookies. The Oreo Churro represents a co-branding partnership between J & J Snack Foods Corp. and Nabisco. J & J Snack Foods also presents PretzelCookie, a snack that looks like a pretzel but tastes like a cookie.

Available in five flavors (lemon, vanilla, oatmeal, chocolate and ginger), the cookies come in easy-to-reseal 15 oz. tubs and 1 oz. bags. Finally, PB&J Softstix—which combine real fruit and peanut butter filling with the taste of soft pretzels—have been added to J & J's food service product line. Write J & J Snack Foods Corp. at 6000 Central Highway, Pennsauken, NJ 08109, or call (609) 665-9534.

VENICE FEST/ DAY AND DATE: NOV. 21

DECEIVER ★★★1/2

Starring Tim Roth, Renee Zellweger, Chris Penn and Michael Rooker. Directed and written by Josh and Jonas Pate. Produced by Peter Glatzer. An MGM release. Drama/thriller. Rated R for violence, language and some sexual content. Running time: 101 minutes. Screened at the Venice film festival. Opens 11/21.

This darkly comic psychological thriller/murder mystery stars the always compelling Tim Roth as Wayland, a disturbed genius accused of killing a prostitute (Renee Zellweger, doing a change-of-pace role from "Jerry Maguire"). But he turns the tables on the investigators ("Mulholland Falls'" Chris Penn and "Rosewood's" Michael Rooker) by using his superior mental abilities to unnerve and manipulate them.

A compulsive liar, temporal lobe epileptic, alcoholic, and filthy rich summa cum laude Harvard psychology graduate with a 151-point IQ, Wayland finds dark games a gleeful distraction from the empty bitterness of his life caused by familial disharmony and other deep-seated emotional problems, and the cocksure but cerebrally inferior detectives are perfect targets for our intellectually formidable antihero.

TRUTH AND CONSEQUENCES: Renee Zellweger and Tim Roth star in MGM's "Deceiver."

Although some of its plot elements are ultimately a little convoluted and confusing, "Deceiver" (which played at Venice under the title "Liar") is a fascinating character study, an impressive actors' showcase, and a superior thriller. Filmmaking brothers Josh and Jonas Pate ("The Grave") show great promise, confidence and originality, particularly exemplified by their uniquely wry method of character exposition.—Christine James

TORONTO

*Too many late starts and too many disgruntled journalists who had trouble seeing all the films they needed to see somewhat marred the 22nd Toronto International Film Festival. But there were more films that curried favour with audiences and critics alike than in past years, including Curtis Hanson's "L.A. Confidential" and Paul Thomas Anderson's "Boogie Nights," which together shared the critics best-picture nod (followed by David Mamet's "The Spanish Prisoner" and Atom Egoyan's "The Sweet Hereafter"). Thom Fitzgerald's "The Hanging Garden" and "The Sweet Hereafter" shared the best Candian feature nod, the first time that award has been split between two contenders; "L.A. Confidential" and Lee Tamahori's "The Edge" come in third and fourth. Carine Adler's U.K. first film "Under The Skin" took the Fipresci international critics prize, and Vincenzo Natali's thriller "Cube" was named best Canadian first feature. Other favorites included Venice-fest best picture winner "Fireworks," "Fudoh: The New Generation," "Washington Square" and "Twenty-FourSeven."—Shlomo Schwartzberg, Canadian Correspondent

KISS OR KILL ★★★

Starring Frances O'Conner, Matt Day, Chris Haywood and Barry Otto. Directed and written by Bill Bennett. Produced by Bill Bennett and Jennifer Bennett. An October Films release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 96 minutes. Opens in November (undated).

There is something extremely likable about this dark and quirky dramatic thriller, which has much to do with the two leads, Frances O'Conner and Matt Day (who both also starred in "Love and Other Catastrophes"). In fact, the problem of the Down Under film is that it's just too darn likable to be a workable thriller. Filmmaker Bill Bennett (who returns to his home country after his less-than-successful American effort "Two If By Sea") begins the film with a powerful opening scene and a Dylan Thomas quote, both of which seem more substantial than the film that follows.

Call it "Two If By Outback," but "Kiss or Kill" is a tale of two grifters, Nikki (O'Conner) and Al (Day), who make their living by doping and robbing married businessmen that Nikki picks up in bars. But, when their latest mark accidentally dies, they take to the road with an incriminating sex tape of a local sports celebrity, Zipper Doyle (Barry Langrishe), that they found in the dead man's briefcase. When folks on their trail start ending up dead, each begins to suspect the other. They find themselves not only on the run from the two detectives and Doyle, but also from their growing suspicions.

Although the film has something to say about how much we really know our lovers and about the nature of trust, it simply isn't clear exactly what that is. The loose, documentary style is a double-edged sword, allowing for a carefree immediacy and yet keeping us distant from the emotional core of the characters. A layer of real fear is lacking from the film, and it's never truly believable that either Nikki or Al is a killer. Still, the performances are lovely, the odd characters engaging and the filmmaking quirky. And there is a scene between two detectives (Chris Haywood and Andrew S. Gilbert) that is worth the price of admission all by itself.—Susan Lambert

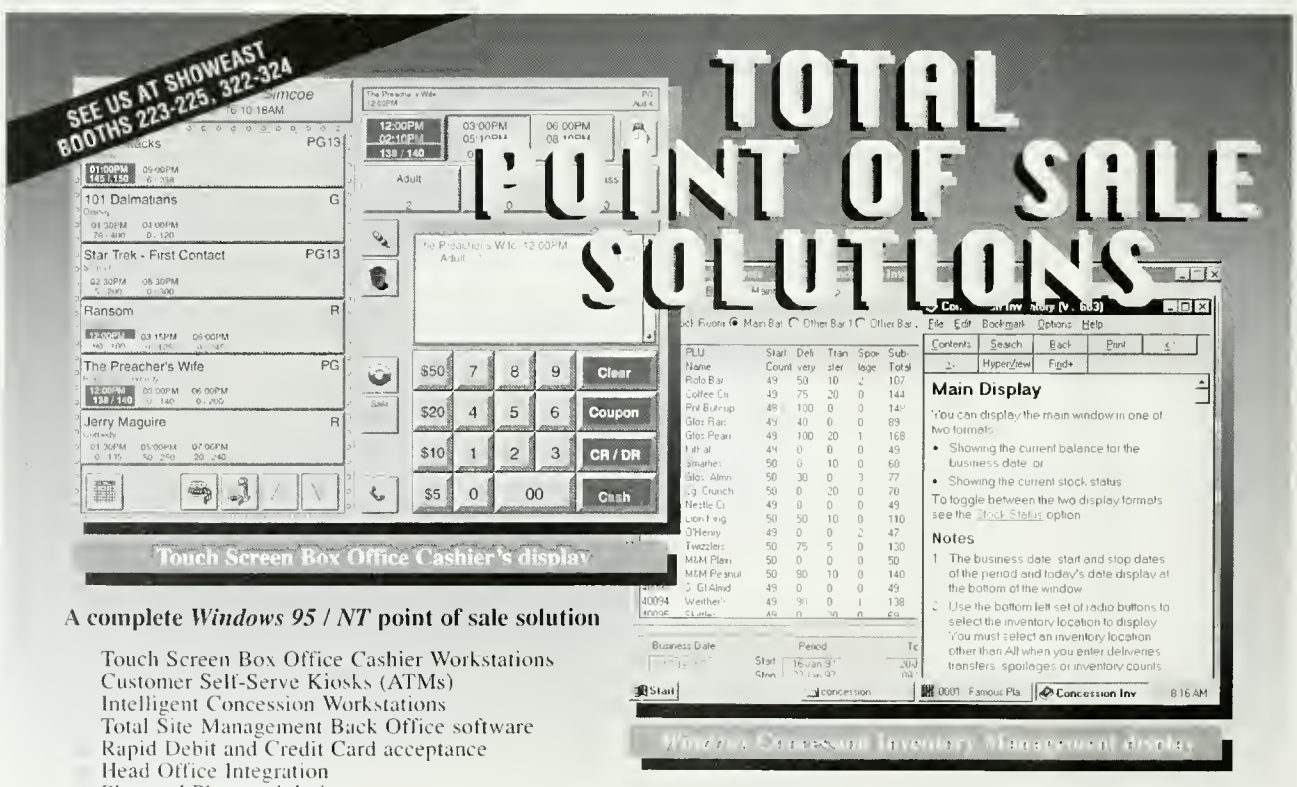
Starring Wesley Snipes, Nastassja Kinski, Robert Downey Jr. and Kyle MacLachlan. Directed and written by Mike Figgis. Produced by Mike Figgis, Annie Stewart and Ben Myron. A New Line release. Drama. Rated R for strong sexuality and language, and for drug content. Running time: 103 min. Opens 11/14.

There probably isn't another contemporary director who can put inchoate moods and sexual undercurrents on the screen quite like Mike Figgis, as shown in "Stormy Monday," "Internal Affairs" and "Leaving Las Vegas." Although in "One Night Stand" he's working from a simpler and less developed story than in his previous films, the emotions he gets at are anything but simple.

Max Carlyle (Wesley Snipes) is a commercial director who is happily married to Mimi ("The Joy Luck Club's" Ming-Na Wen) in Los Angeles. One night during a trip to New York, he meets another woman, Karen (Nastassja Kinski), who is also married. Their chance encounter leads to just a one-night stand, but when Max returns home he is no longer the same person. When he goes back to New York a year later to visit his friend Charlie (Robert Downey Jr.) who is being hospitalized with AIDS, he finds out that Karen is married to Charlie's brother Vernon ("Showgirls'" Kyle MacLachlan).

Despite a miscue at the beginning that has him talking to the camera, Snipes (who won the best actor prize at the Venice fest for his work here) hasn't been this good or this engaging since "Rising Sun." And Kinski, who's prone to brooding, shows a frisky and sensual side that hasn't been evident since James Toback's "Exposed." Downey, who has the role of the dying artist, also turns a cliche into a tour-de-force, delivering what Tom Hanks only promised in "Philadelphia."



"One Night Stand" could be an appropriate bookend to Hal Ashby/Robert Towne's "Shampoo" (1974). "Shampoo" was about how the hopeful and hedonistic '60s came to an end, with people pairing off and settling for something less from sexual partners than they once desired. "One Night Stand" is about hedonistic people who've lived compromised lives and are now trying to find new ways to sexually and emotionally connect within the diminished expectations of the '90s.—Kevin Courrier

Starring Sally Potter, Pablo Veron and Heathcote Williams. Directed and written by Sally Potter. Produced by Christopher Sheppard. A Sony Classics release. Drama. French- and Spanish-language; English subtitles. Rated PG for brief language and some violent images. Running time: 101 min. Opens 11/14 NY.

In "The Tango Lesson," Sally Potter ("Orlando") returns to her roots as a professional dancer (which she was before she started making short dance films in 1972). Instead of celebrating movement or exploring the cultural roots of the tango itself, she turns the story into a self-serving examination of the issue of control in romantic relationships.

Potter plays a film director working on a script that seems to be about fashion models brought together by a legless designer who involves them in a photo shoot—and then the models start getting assassinated by snipers. While Hollywood producers are trying to decide what to make of this rather questionable idea for a movie, Potter takes tango lessons from a passionate hunk (Pablo Veron) who has just lost his dance partner. While they do the tango, they also do the dance of love. The idea Potter seems to be putting across is that, in the tango, the female follows, whereas Potter's instincts as a director means that she should lead. By the end, she leads all right; she even starts to sing, which should just about get audiences hoofing right out of the theatre.

As in "Orlando," Potter combines the instincts of a theoretical feminist with a Harlequin romantic, which means that as a dramatist she's both abstract and sentimental. Put another way, in "The Tango Lesson" and "Orlando" she wants audiences to be swooning with her petulant heroines and their sexual fantasies while at the same time learning important political lessons about gender and control. "The Tango Lesson" certainly looks better than "Orlando," with Robby Muller's black-and-white cinematography giving the film at the very least a graphic vitality.—Kevin Courrier

Starring Helena Bonham Carter, Linus Roache, Alison Elliott and Charlotte Rampling. Directed by Iain Softley. Written by Hossein Amini. Produced by Stephen Evans and David Parfitt. A Miramax release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality. Running time: 108 min. Opens 11/7 wide.

This is a handsome adaptation of Henry James's 1902 novel, which (like "The Bostonians," "Daisy Miller" and "The Portrait of a Lady") deals with the emergence of the modern woman in a world bound by tradition, corruption and hypocrisy. But what the movie lacks is the excitement and friction of the new clashing with the old. Iain Softley ("Backbeat," "Hackers") doesn't generate his usual impudent energy.

In "The Wings of a Dove," Kate Croy (Helena Bonham Carter) finds a place in high society thanks to her Aunt Maud (Charlotte Rampling), who also keeps her desperately poor father alive providing she abides by her wishes to marry respectably. But Kate is in love with a young and penniless journalist, Merton Densher ("Priest's" Linus Roache). When Milly Theale ("The Spitfire Grill's" Alison Elliott), an attractive and wealthy young American heiress—who also happens to be dying—arrives in England, Kate launches a plot that she hopes will allow her to marry Merton without having to defy her aunt.

Part of what's wrong with "The Wings of a Dove" is Bonham Carter, who has played this kind of role too often. Her Kate comes across as too fractious rather than someone torn by her ambitions. Roache, however, is quite convincing as a man whose deeper emotional yearnings get the better of him. And Elliott is able to bring out Milly's dignified search for happiness and friendship without it seeming mawkish. As for Softley, a director who tries to pay reverence to a classic novel often can't make the material his own. "The Wings of a Dove" is not a terrible adaptation (like Jane Campion's "The Portrait of a Lady"), it's just not an exciting one.—Kevin Courrier

Starring Mark Wahlberg, Julianne Moore and Burt Reynolds. Directed and written by Paul Thomas Anderson. Produced by Lloyd Levin, John Lyons, Paul Thomas Anderson, Joanne Sellar and Daniel Lupi. A New Line release. Comedy/drama. Rated R for strong sex scenes with explicit dialogue, nudity, drug use, language and violence. Run time: 150 min. Opens 11/7 wide after mid-Oct. ltd bow.

A lengthy look at the world of pornographic filmmakers, circa the late '70s and '80s, "Boogie Nights" is a well-crafted, well-acted entertainment but one that doesn't dig too deep into its subject. Seen mostly through the eyes of Eddie Adams ("Traveller's" Mark Wahlberg), a naive, aimless California youth who lucks into a new career as a porn star, "Boogie Nights" covers a trajectory that could be called The Rise and Fall of a Porn Star. At the outset, Eddie, who's renamed himself Dirk Diggler, is riding high, embraced by a happy, oblivious family of outsiders, including amiable Jack Horner (Burt Reynolds), a director with delusions of grandeur; his sweet wife, actress Amber Waves ("The Lost World: Jurassic Park's" Julianne Moore); Buck ("Devil in a Blue Dress'" Don Cheadle), an actor who really wants to operate a stereo store; Rollergirl ("Swingers'" Heather Graham), who takes off everything but her skates; and Little Bill ("Fargo's" William H. Macy), a behind-the-scenes organizer who's always catching his wife in compromising positions.

Their shenanigans are bracketed by the awful but catchy disco music and horrendous fashions of the time, and "Boogie Nights" doesn't delve much deeper than that. It too neatly divides the "innocent" '70s from the "bad" '80s, with everything falling apart for the film's mainly superficial characters. AIDS is not mentioned and, although video is referred to as "the wave of the future," its impetus in bringing porn out of disreputable theatres into the average American's home, and making it more popular than ever, is flagrantly ignored.

Paul Thomas Anderson ("Hard 8") is a very talented filmmaker, effectively going in a blink of the eye from comedy to Tarantino-inspired violence, but he doesn't have a brain in his head. "Boogie Nights" could have been a filmic version of Terry Southern's brilliant satirical porn novel "Candy," but the film, if enjoyable, says nothing about America. Like most porn, it's as superficial as they come.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

Starring Bob Flanagan and Sheree Rose. Directed and produced by Kirby Dick. A CFP release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 89 min. Opens 11/8 NY/LA.

This documentary—subtitled "The Life and Death of Bob Flanagan, Supermasochist"—directed by Kirby Dick concerns an underground masochistic performance artist who died of cystic fibrosis. "Sick" is the shockingly graphic story of the fast life and slow death of Bob Flanagan, a hero of sorts to those in the sexual underground who find an evening of piercing, poking and prodding more interesting than, well, an evening in front of the tube with the dog. Rising to notoriety on the success of several explicit short films he completed with his wife and dominant master, Sheree Rose, in the late 1980s, Flanagan succumbed to congenital CF, which he incorporated, quite ironically, into performances until his 1996 death.

This is a film that in no uncertain terms is for mature audiences only. It contains language and depicts sexual acts that most will find appalling and intolerable, and this fact overshadows any enticing human element the film tries to extend. Nevertheless, a select group will surely find it challenging and, dare we say it, informative.—Jon Alon Walz

GATTACA ★★

Starring Ethan Hawke, Uma Thurman and Jude Law. Directed and written by Andrew Niccol. Produced by Danny DeVito, Michael Shamberg and Stacey Sher. A Columbia release. SF. Rated PG-13 for brief violent images, language and some sexuality. Running time: 112 min.

Set in the 21st century, "Gattaca" tackles the high sci-fi concept of genetic manipulation in a future in which potential for disease, defects and aptitudes can be fully determined right at birth. Those deemed inferior—the invalids—are tossed on the lower rung of society, while the perfect specimens have the run of their world, their every dream and wish fulfilled. So what happens when one Vincent Freeman ("Before Sunrise's" Ethan Hawke), a sickly youth whose life span is limited, decides he wants to ascend the highest peaks and join a momentous manned mission to Titan? He switches identities with a paraplegic super-athlete ("Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil's" Jude Law) and goes to work at Gattaca Corp., where his dream seems about to come true.

Begging the question of why this medically superior future society can't heal a broken back, "Gattaca" betrays its lack of imagination at virtually every turn. It's one of those annoying SF movies that doesn't look futuristic and that doesn't really deal with its main idea, which is the meaning of humanity and how it can be determined. Instead, writer/director Andrew Niccol takes a side trip into mystery as a murder threatens Vincent's standing at Gattaca. The whodunit aspect is old hat and it takes up too much time before trickling to a flat resolution.

In the lead, Hawke turns in a humorless performance, as does Uma Thurman as a fellow employee who discovers his secret. Even appearances by Gore Vidal as Gattaca's head and Alan Arkin as a sardonic detective investigating the murder don't add much to the proceedings. Niccol does have an eye for beauty and "Gattaca" is certainly well designed. But the movie, like Michael Nyman's excessively sentimental score, is underwhelming. It's SF on the surface but it doesn't stimulate the way the best science fiction does.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

SWEPT FROM THE SEA ★

Starring Vincent Perez, Rachel Weisz, Ian McKellen and Kathy Bates. Directed by Beeban Kidron. Written by Tim Willocks. Produced by Polly Tapson, Charles Steel and Beeban Kidron. A TriStar release. Drama. Rated PG-13 for elements of theme and some sensuality. Running time: 114 min.

You can sweep this one right back where it came from. It's an embarrassingly florid romantic melodrama from director Beeban Kidron ("To Wong Foo, Thanks for Everything, Julie Newmar"). Based on a Joseph Conrad short story ("Amy Foster"), it dredges up just about every cliche imaginable. Stormy seas, lovers perched on horizon's edge, repressed townfolk perched on the edge of madness, and fits of screaming passion: All are served on a platter of John Barry's crashing music, which makes one think the theatre's being bombed.

Amy Foster ("Chain Reaction's" Rachel Weisz) is a simple girl who's considered an outsider in her small town of Colebrook. One day she falls in love with Yanko ("The Crow: City of Angels'" Vincent Perez), a Ukrainian survivor of a shipwreck. Initially he's thought by the town to be mad and dangerous, until he's befriended by Dr. Kennedy ("Richard III's" Ian McKellen), who recognizes Yanko's intelligence and starts to teach him English. When Yanko and Amy get married, the townsfolk become upset and drive the couple to tragedy.

This is basically the same kind of purple masochism that had some critics and audience members applauding "Breaking the Waves" last year. The difference is that this is a much more old-fashioned romantic weeper.—Kevin Courrier

SEVEN YEARS IN TIBET ★★1/2

Starring Brad Pitt and David Thewlis. Directed by Jean-Jacques Annaud. Written by Becky Johnston. Produced by Jean-Jacques Annaud, John H. Williams and Iain Smith. A TriStar release. Drama. Rated PG-13 for some violent sequences. Running time: 139 min.

Perhaps it's unfair to burden a simple movie with world concerns, but as an art form the cinema does deal with human concerns. Despite an intriguing story (adapting Austrian mountaineer Heinrich Harrer's book), a challenging mix of the ugly and the dashing in a lead performance by Brad Pitt, and a series of provocative locales, this Mandalay production fails to create an acceptable story of a man and his values even on the film's own terms.

"I'm Austrian, I'm a climber, I have nothing to do with your silly war," Harrer (Pitt) tells a British officer as he is arrested in 1939 during a Himalayan ascent. Although a voluntary member of the Nazi party since 1933 (a fact not made clear in the film) and an SS athletic trainer (ditto), Harrer wants to conquer peaks, not peoples. Portrayed as a relentlessly cruel man, Harrer has already made a disaster of his marriage, which has borne him a son he has yet to see. Escaping from internment, Harrer and fellow climber Peter Aufschnaiter (David Thewlis) head into Tibet where, although the movie also muffs this point, Harrer apparently has a change of heart after befriending the young Dalai Lama (Jamyang Wangchuk) and, witness to the Chinese invasion, seeing how evil is transgression. The movie ends in 1951 Austria with father and son and a Tibetan flag atop a mountain. The air virtually rings with a supposed purity of heart.

Although Harrer would have been present for Kristalnacht and the early concentration camp builds, he was virtually in another world when World War II and the

But that world of his is also resolutely immoral: There is no mention made of an apology to his ruthlessly mistreated wife, and his eventual union with his son occurs not because the boy needs him, but because Harrer decides he needs his son. The work of director Jean-Jacques Annaud ("The Lover") is undone by an unfulfilling script by Becky Johnston ("Prince of Tides"); in her telling, not even a wealth of time spent with one of the holiest humans on earth could remake Harrer into the good man "Seven Years in Tibet" wants us to believe him to be.—Kim Williamson

THE ASSIGNMENT ★★1/2

Starring Aidan Quinn, Donald Sutherland and Ben Kingsley. Directed by Christian Duguay. Written by Dan Gordon and Sabi H. Shabtai. Produced by Tom Berry and Franco Battista. A Triumph release. Drama. Rated R for strong violence, sexuality and language. Running time: 115 min.

The turbulent life story of the notorious Venezuelan terrorist known as Carlos has been freely adapted to the screen in an occasionally intelligent but more often inept manner. Not only does the film inflate Carlos's "accomplishments," it resorts to the worst cliches and overacting in doing so.

The film begins excitedly enough, with Carlos throwing a grenade into the midst of a crowded Parisian cafe. A moment earlier, he had begged a light and revealed himself to a CIA operative (Donald Sutherland) who goes by the name of Jack Shaw. Shaw swears revenge and finds his chance when the Israeli Mossad, led by Amos (Ben Kingsley), picks up a man they think is Carlos. He's actually a U.S. Navy man named Annibal Ramirez (Aidan Quinn), which is Carlos's last name, and he's a dead ringer for the terrorist. Amos and Shaw decide that they will use the fake Carlos to get the real one killed.

"The Assignment" does avoid political correctness by not equating the two sides or giving any justification for Carlos' murderous acts. Nor does it condemn the Western powers or Israel for going after Carlos in the first place. Eliminating him is simply a necessity. But if "The Assignment" shows some sophistication in its portrayal of the two sides, it's still burdened by some overblown dialogue and Sutherland's teeth-gnashing turn as the obsessive Shaw. Helmer Christian Duguay ("Screamers") is also not a suspense director; except for one Libyan chase scene, he fails to juice the film.

But Quinn is a standout as Annibal, who's in over his head and against his will. But the subplot of his assumed identity turning him into a brutal replica of Carlos is dealt with too late in the film to have much impact. Despite core smarts, "The Assignment" makes the grade only as melodramatic pap.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

Starring Samuel L. Jackson, Lynn Whitfield, Debbi Morgan and Diahann Carroll. Directed and written by Kasi Lemmons. Produced by Caldecott Chubb and Samuel L. Jackson. A Trimark release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality and language. Running time: 108 min. Opens 11/7 wide after 10/24 NY/LA bow.

"Eve's Bayou" is a very promising writing/directorial debut for Kasi Lemmons, till now an actress ("Fear of a Black Hat"). Eve (Jurnee Smollett) is 10 years old and lives in a prosperous Black Creole family in Louisiana in the early '60s. Eve's father, Louis ("Pulp Fiction's" Samuel L. Jackson), is a popular and successful doctor. Eve begins to discover what is going on beneath the seemingly happy surface of her family life. She accidentally sees her charming father being unfaithful to her beautiful mother ("A Thin Line Between Love and Hate's" Lynn Whitfield). Her Aunt Mozelle (Debbi Morgan), whose three husbands have each died unexpectedly, predicts the future. As Eve discovers more family secrets, she believes that to save her family she must make a pact with a voodoo woman (Diahann Carroll).

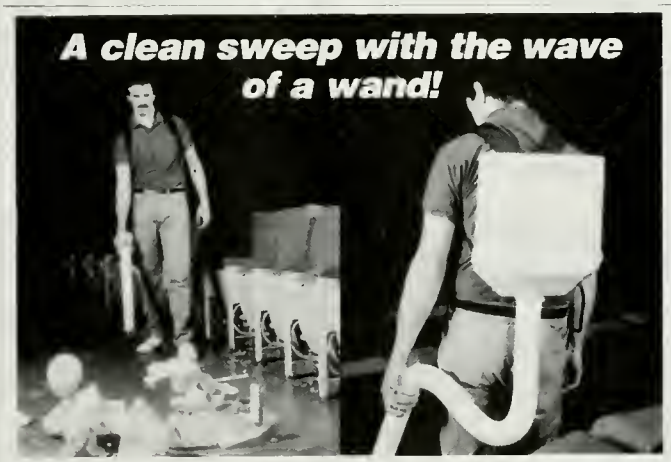
ter to the veteran Carroll, is very impressive. The actors bring out the subtle and complicated relationships. Jackson (who also produced) is charismatic as the father Eve comes to believe is a source of family problems; Whitfield and Morgan are very affecting as Eve's unhappy mother and aunt. Vondie Curtis Hall (the director's husband, who helmed "Gridlock'd") plays Aunt Mozelle's latest lover, who is not afraid of the curse that Mozelle believes has tragically ended her three marriages.

"Memory is a selection of images," Eve says. This also describes Lemmons' assured direction, which accumulates the daily details of growing in vibrant Louisiana as filtered through a child's perception. Lemmons skillfully shows the old superstitions that are mixed in with the family's modern lifestyle.—Ed Scheid

GUMMO ★★

Starring Jacob Reynolds, Nick Sutton, Chloe Sevigny and Linda Manz. Directed and written by Harmony Korine. Produced by Cary Woods. A Fine Line release. Drama. Rated R for pervasive depiction of anti-social behavior of juveniles, including violence, substance abuse, sexuality and language. Running time: 89 min. Opens 10/17 NY/LA/Tor.

"Gummo" is the first directorial effort of 23-year-old Harmony Korine, who wrote the screenplay for the controversial "Kids." This film, also written by Korine, is set in Xenia, Ohio, a small town that was devastated by a tornado a few years before and still reeks of poverty and emptiness. The residents live in rundown houses with tattered furniture and high piles of unwashed clothes; cockroaches abound.



Korine has shot "Gummo" in the straightforward style of a documentary. Grainy footage is intercut throughout, frequently giving the film a home-movie look. To maintain realism, Korine uses many nonprofessionals; he cast Nick Sutton in the leading part of Tummler after seeing him on a "Sally Jesse Raphael Show" about former troubled teenagers. "Gummo" contains many disturbing and realistic scenes of lives without values or guidance, and the young characters' obscenities add to the unsettling mood. But there's more unsettlement: To relieve their boredom, two teenage friends, Tummler and Solomon (Jacob Reynolds), kill stray cats to sell to a Chinese restaurant, and they use the money to get high from sniffing glue; a man pimps for a retarded girl; after a father loses an arm-wrestling match to his son, he demolishes the furniture in a room.

The most bizarre scenes are of a silent boy with a sad face and wearing pink bunny ears who travels through the town. Chloe Sevigny (another "Kids" vet) designed the costumes for "Gummo" and plays a white-haired girl searching for her missing cat. One of the few adult actors in the cast is Linda Manz ("Days of Heaven") as Solomon's mother, who unexpectedly tap-dances in tribute to her dead husband. Korine's screenplay for "Kids" used a suspense element to hold the film together. In contrast, the various stories in "Gummo" remain disconnected, making the film rambling and unfocused. The film also loses interest because Korine never penetrates his characters' troubled surfaces.—Ed Scheid

In his latest film, Oliver Stone takes a "U-Turn" from his controversial histories of "Nixon" and "JFK" to the suspense of film noir. As vultures fly overhead, Bobby (Sean Penn) is driving through the Arizona desert to pay off a gambling debt in Las Vegas when his car breaks down and he is forced to stop in a rundown desert town. more violence if they are not paid on time. In the seemingly quiet town, Bobby unexpectedly loses his money and becomes enmeshed in manipulation, murder and violence as his departing is delayed.

The entire cast gives vivid performances, especially Billy Bob Thornton ("Sling Blade") as a seedy and devious mechanic who threatens not to repair Bobby's car without suitable payment. Penn effectively conveys Bobby's increasing desperation, while Jennifer Lopez ("Selena") does fine work as Grace, a sultry femme fatale with a much older, wealthy husband (Nick Nolte). Both husband and wife offer to pay Bobby to kill the other. Even as he becomes attracted to Grace, Bobby is so anxious to get out of town that he might be forced to consider taking up one of the offers to pay for his damaged car. Bobby is regularly beaten up by a young bully ("Inventing the Abbotts'" Joaquin Phoenix) whose flirtatious girlfriend ("William Shakespeare's Romeo & Juliet's" Claire Danes) sees Bobby as her way to get out of town. Powers Boothe ("Sudden Death") portrays a sheriff unable to keep his town in control.

Even small parts are colorful, including Jon Voight as a blind Indian and Julie Hagerty as a "waitress named Flo." The script is based on screenwriter John Ridley's book "Stray Dogs," but what propels the familiar plot (reminiscent of "Red Rock West") is Stone's trademark intensity. As in previous efforts like "Natural Born Killers," Stone combines different types of film stock, often giving "U-Turn" a gritty look with heightened colors and blazing sunlight; the look of the film and the expressionistic camera angles reflect the raw passions of the characters. "U-Turn" is fast-paced throughout, with unexpected bursts of twisted humor among the bloody closeups of beatings, shootings and mutilation.—Ed Scheid

CAPITAINE CONAN ★★★★

Starring Philippe Torreton, Samuel Le Bihan and Bernard Le Coq. Directed by Bertrand Tavernier. Written by Bertrand Tavernier and Jean Cosmos. Produced by Alain Sarde and Fredric Bourboulon. A Kino release. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 130 min.

French director Bertrand Tavernier's latest film, "Capitaine Conan," an epic tour-de-force set in the Balkans at the close of the First World War, hits with such intelligence, dramatic skill and brute cinematic force that it literally leaves moviegoers stunned as the lights come back up. An adaptation of Roger Vercel's semi-autobiographical 1939 novel, this is one of the most engrossing, morally complex and psychologically insightful war films in recent memory—reducing Hollywood claptrap like "G.I. Jane" to the level of a Three Stooges short.

The grasp of Tavernier, who won the 1996 best director Cesar, is masterful, plunging the viewer deep into the chilling ambiguities and Byzantine complexities of a secret war that continued long after Armistice Day. The movie deftly shuttles among the bureaucratic farce, military courtsmanship, violent thrill of the front, and cutting politics of the officers mess. The battle scenes are as visceral as those in "Glory" but work in a completely different, handheld way that bows to the neo-realist European cinema of the '40s.

Philippe Torreton (winner of the 1996 Cesar for best actor) stars as Conan, the leader of a band of guerrillas who ruthlessly fight behind enemy lines and who are useful to the high command only to a point. Samuel Le Bihan gives an understated performance as Lt. Norbert, an educated teacher who makes for an unlikely recipient of Conan's respect but who can go only so far in agreeing with his friend's methods. Although much of the theme and incident has been portrayed in countless war films, "Capitaine Conan" avoids cinematic and sentimental cliche. It is a finely wrought film—as hard, precise and heartbreaking as its title character.—Alex Albanese

MONTREAL

The market was quiet, and not too many films in competition excited the crowds. Yet the 21st Montreal World Film Festival still had its share of standouts, including best-picture winner Majid Majidi's "The Children of Heaven," an Iranian entrant that was quickly snapped up by Miramax for North American distribution. In addition to receiving the Grand Prix of the Americas, "The Children of Heaven" also won the Air Canada People's Choice Award for most popular film, a rare confluence of public and jury opinion. And, if that wasn't enough, "The Children of Heaven" also garnered a special mention from the Fipresci jury.

*Other big winners were John Duigan's "Lawn Dogs," a U.K. effort that brought a best actor award for Sam Rockwell; Bill Bennett's Australian drama "Kiss or Kill," which saw Frances O'Conner pick up best actress and also garnered a best artistic contribution award (shared with Juraj Jakubisko's Czech film "An Ambiguous Report About the End of the World." Carlos Saura's "Pajarico" from Spain and Juni Ichikawa's Japanese film "Tokyo Lullaby" shared the best director nod.—Shlomo Schwartzberg, Canadian Correspondent

AMERICAN PERFEKT ★★★1/2

Starring Fairuza Balk, Robert Forster, Amanda Plummer, Paul Sorvino, David Thewlis, Geoffrey Lewis, Chris Sarandon and Joanna Gleason. Directed and written by Paul Chart. Produced by Irvin Kershner. A New Image production; no stateside distributor set. Thriller. Rated R for grisly violence, strong sexuality/nudity and language. Running time: 100 min.

The wedded team of filmmaker Paul Chart and actress Amanda Plummer ("Drunks") does not allow "American Perfekt" to languish in the hipper-than-hip modern film-noir genre that has seized Hollywood by the throat in recent years. Cleverly conceived, the project benefits from the British writer/director's unerring instinct for nimble plot twists and dialogue, as well as from his wife's singular acting skills.

Set in a remorseless California desert landscape, the film unfolds with what are at first baffling snippets of action. The jittery, frazzled Sandra (Plummer) might or might not have been run off the road by Santini ("Seven Years in Tibet's" David Thewlis), a slimy charlatan with a suitcase full of double-faced Kennedy half-dollars. Her savior in this dilemma is a handsome criminal psychiatrist named Jake (Robert Forster) with a penchant for flipping a coin to make all his decisions. "Worrying's my specialty," Sandra tells him. "That's what I do." Turns out there is more to worry about than she ever imagined, of course, as violence tightens its grip on events that hurtle toward surprising conclusions. These bizarre losers meet up in several locations en route to Pear Blossom, a misnomer for the barren-looking place where Sandra is to meet her sister Alice ("The Craft's" Fairuza Balk) for a joint trip home to Utah.

More than anything else, "American Perfekt" is reminiscent of John Dahl's "Red Rock West," a droll 1993 picture populated with similar denizens of a nightmarish hinterland. A documentarian from London, Chart gives his first fiction feature even higher stakes. The one really glaring problem in all this tightly wrapped suspense is Forster's performance, which is too creepy to fool seasoned moviegoers able to spot a psycho long before the spilling of blood. Yet, although Jake should be far more seductive and sympathetic, such mistakes do not significantly diminish the punch of this smart little thriller.—Susan Green

ANOTHER 9 1/2 WEEKS 1/2

Starring Mickey Rourke, Angie Everhart and Steven Berkoff. Directed by Anne Goursaud. Written by Michael Davis. Produced by Staffan Ahrenberg and Yannick Bernard. A Cinevisions production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 101 min.

Did someone advise Angie Everhart ("Bordello of Blood") that making a movie with Mickey Rourke might speed her transition from supermodel to starlet? Time for a new agent, perhaps. Adrian Lyne's slick 1986 spectacle of erotic obsession took place, as the title implied, over a period of 9 1/2 weeks. This idiotic sequel might cover only a few days but plays like 9 1/2 years.

There is less sadomasochism onscreen than in the act of actually sitting through the film, directed by Anne Goursaud ("Lilly") with little concern for making sense with logic or dialogue. Whereas its predecessor was set in Manhattan, "Another 9 1/2 Weeks" has moved to Paris—surely a good idea, in that the French apparently perceive Rourke as some kind of god. God dwells in shadow during much of the action: When Rourke steps into the light, his face has odd bulges like one of sci-fi's shape-shifting creatures. The soft-core bondage is so dull that viewers can afford to spend a good deal of time pondering, "What's with this guy?"

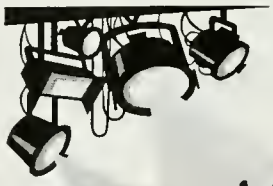
The half-baked plot sends John (Rourke as the wealthy Wall Street broker) abroad, trying to find Elizabeth (played by Kim Basinger 11 years ago) at an art auction. Instead, he meets and mates with her friend Lea (Everhart), a fashion designer with an appetite for kinky sex. The only stumbling block to their mutual fulfillment is John's decision to swear off cruelty, despite the fact that the opening scene has him using a straight razor to caress the breast of a prostitute. So much for New Year's resolutions. The decadence that "Another 9 1/2 Weeks" strives to achieve is best captured at a party, where the grim guests, all same-sex pairings, watch a naked woman tortured with hot candle wax.—Susan Green

THE ASSISTANT ★★★1/2

Starring Armin Mueller-Stahl, Joan Plowright, Gil Bellows and Kate Greenhouse. Directed and written by Daniel Petrie. Produced by Paul Brown, Jon Slan and Daniel Petrie. A HandMade/Paragon/Miracle production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 106 min.

In the process of moving from novel to screen, "The Assistant" has lost some complexity by gaining the rosy glow of mass appeal. The 1957 Bernard Malamud novel about a young drifter's spiritual transformation exposed the darker side of Frank Alpine; writer/director Daniel Petrie's version, set in Depression-era New York but shot in Toronto with attention to period detail, swaps edginess for earnestness.



From start to finish, the movie's Frank ("The Shawshank Redemption's" Gil Bellows) remains an essentially nice Italian boy led astray by Ward Minogue (Jaimz Woolvet), a stock ne'er-do-well with violent anti-Semitic inclinations. Consequently, there's a less than compelling arc of change when Frank tries to make amends to an elderly Jewish couple (Armin Mueller-Stahl and Joan Plowright, in a third onscreen teaming after "Avalon" and "A Pyromaniac's Love Story") he'd victimized.

Although Petrie ("Resurrection," "Rocket Gibraltar") has had a three-decade flirtation with the idea of adapting Malamud's work, he fails to sharpen the moral dilemmas that are so provocative in the book. But he demonstrates a kinship with the late author's thesis about the purpose of Judaism: to be a "mensch"—a person of integrity and honor. Mueller-Stahl creates this attribute with graceful aplomb for his character, the decent proprietor of a grocery store who has lost his own son. Plowright gives an even more nuanced performance as his wife, a guarded woman fiercely protective of their daughter Helen (Kate Greenhouse). Helen's romance with Frank hasn't established much chemistry by the time it hits plot-driven obstacles, many of them stemming from his falsehoods. The abbreviated story also insists we take it on faith that, in seeking forgiveness,

Frank finds transcendence by embracing religion. Nonetheless, the essence of Malamud's vision seems blessed by a mitzvah giving "The Assistant" emotional power beyond its parts' sum.—Susan Green

BAD MANNERS ★★

Starring Saul Rubinek, David Strathairn and Bonnie Bedelia. Directed by Jonathan Kaufer. Written by David Gilman. Produced by J. Todd Harris. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 87 min.

Do we really need another spin on "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" Obviously, scripter David Gilman (who here adapts his play, "Ghost in the Machine") and helmer Jonathan Kaufer think so. But "Bad Manners" is plain bad, with portentous dialogue and paper-thin characterizations.

Bonnie Bedelia ("Needful Things") and David Strathairn ("Mother Night") play Nancy and Wes, an academic, conservative couple who host Nancy's old boyfriend, Matt (Saul Rubinek), a musicologist who has come to Boston to lecture at Harvard. Along for the ride is Kim (Caroleen Feeney), Matt's sexy girlfriend, who immediately stirs the sexual pot, with the predictable fireworks following.

Although the women manage to imbue their characters with some depth, Rubinek and Strathairn aren't so lucky. The former is a mere sap and the latter a stereotypical stuffed shirt, and both are constrained by Gilman's hopelessly contrived script and Kaufer's overemphatic direction. It's been 15 years since Kaufer's directorial debut, the charming romantic comedy "Soup for One," which also starred Rubinek. "Bad Manners" suggests he waited too long for a followup.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

A BROOKLYN STATE OF MIND ★

Starring Danny Aiello, Vincent Spano, Tony Danza, Abe Vigoda and Maria Grazia Cucinotta. Directed by Frank Rainone. Written by Frank Rainone and Frederick Stroppel. Produced by Peter R. Simpson. A Norstar production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Rated R for strong language and some violence. Running time: 90 min.

With yet another Danny Aiello mobster role in tow, "A Brooklyn State of Mind" lumbers along, imitating every Italian thug movie ever made. Like Robert De Niro's "A Bronx Tale," this neighborhood saga sets its sights on one New York City borough. Co-writer/director Frank Rainone studied under Lina Wertmuller and worked for Federico Fellini before making his 1994 first feature, "Me and the Mob." But the only European sensibility he recreates comes care of Maria Grazia Cucinotta, reprising her voluptuous poses from "Il Postino" as an unconvincing documentary filmmaker with a hidden agenda and revealing costumes. Cast members don't seem embarrassed by the numbing material about a reluctant enforcer (Vincent Spano) for a local crime syndicate who moonlights as a jazz drummer. Abe Vigoda, playing his uncle, has a few interesting moments; Tony Danza's bartender does nothing memorable; and Aiello simply makes people offers they cannot refuse.—Susan Green

CALL OF THE WILD ★★★★

Narrated by Richard Dreyfuss. Starring Rutger Hauer, Bronwen Booth and Charles Powell. Directed by Peter Svatek. Written by Graham Ludlow. Produced by Pieter Kroonenburg and Julie Allan. A Greenlight production; no stateside distributor set. Adventure. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

More a bout of terrific storytelling on screen than a conventional movie, "Call of the Wild" respects the literary brilliance of Jack London. Adapted by Graham Ludlow from the novelist's 1903 book, the Peter Svatek film chronicles the life of Buck, a handsome St. Bernard played by pooches named Vasko, Gessa and Gustave. Richard Dreyfuss' intermittent narration gives the engrossing fable a canine-like POV.

Abducted and transported to the Yukon during the Klondike Gold Rush, Buck endures much misery pulling sleds through the snow until rescued by John Thornton (Rutger Hauer, in his best performance since "Blade Runner"). The frozen-north vistas are stunning thanks to director of photography Sylvain Brault. Alan Reeves has composed the rare score that enhances rather than overwhelms the action. Also rare, if not entirely unique, is a disclaimer that comes before opening credits to point out that no animals were harmed. Buck's no Disney dog.—Susan Green

THE CHILDREN OF HEAVEN ★★★1/2

Starring Mohammad Amir Naji, Mir Farrokh Hashemian and Bahare Seddiqi. Directed and written by Majid Majidi. Produced by Seyed Sared Seyedzadeh. A Miramax release. Drama. Farsi-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

Yet another fine film from Iran, "The Children of Heaven" deals with that country's favorite subject: children and their difficult, sometimes perilous path through an indifferent adult world. When a young man loses his sister's only—and recently mended—pair of shoes, the siblings have to share the boy's footwear, because they're scared to tell their father about the loss and can't afford to buy a replacement pair for the girl. Their plan soon becomes untenable, so it's up to the boy to find a way to get his sister a new pair of shoes.

From that unlikely premise, writer/director Majid Majidi fashions a fascinating film about the lower rungs of society, where what you wear on your feet says much about your status. And never has owning a pair of shoes seemed so important. As the camera lingers on each individual's shoes, Majidi sneaks in potent criticism of an Iranian society populated with beggars, angry storekeepers and teachers who favor some students over others. It's a provocative portrait of modern Iran but one that doesn't lose sight of its main characters: the youngsters who are more moral than the elders but are never unbearably or unbelievably nice.

"The Children of Heaven" bears some similarities to Jafar Panahi's "The White Balloon," which dealt with an Iranian girl's attempts to retrieve money she lost with which she was to purchase some goldfish for the holidays. Majidi may be a more stolid director than the imaginative Panahi, but his script probes deeper, obliquely attacking the capitalist basis of Islamic Iran.

Boasting Iranian cinema's traditional virtues of superb acting and smart writing, "The Children of Heaven" is evidence that what seems to be a thin skein, children on quests, is still capable of resulting in rich moviemaking. The well has not yet come up dry.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

COLIN FITZ ★★★★

Starring William H. Macy, Matt McGrath, Andy Fowle, Martha Plimpton, Julianne Phillips, Mary McCormack and John C. McGinley. Directed by Robert Bella. Written by Tom Morrissey. Produced by Robert Bella and Thomas J. Morgan. A Baby Shark production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 86 min.

Robert Bella's assured first feature caps more than a decade of stage work with the Atlantic Theater Company. The New York troupe was founded by David Mamet and William H. Macy ("Fargo"), who shows up in "Colin Fitz" as the nincompoop boss of a private security firm that assigns two employees to guard a rock star's grave on the anniversary of his death.

They might as well be waiting for Godot. The boisterous Grady (Andy Fowle) and the sensitive Paul (Matt McGrath, an Atlantic regular) are a delightful odd couple arguing about the notion that Neil Young's "Keep on Rockin' in the Free World" precipitated the fall of communism. They also encounter a steady stream of eccentrics, including a fan (Martha Plimpton), the dead idol's widow (Julianne Phillips), and a drunken cemetery groundskeeper (John C. McGinley) who adds a magic realism to this wonderfully ironic tale.—Susan Green

DOGTOWN ★★

Starring Trevor St. John, Mary Stuart Masterson and Jon Favreau. Directed and written by George Hickenlooper. Produced by Donald Zuckerman, Michael Beugg and Bradford L. Schlei. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 89 min.

A "Last Picture Show" wannabe, "Dogtown" brings little that is new to its saga of a young man returning to his small hometown and unearthing emotional ghosts from his youth. Philip Van Horn (Trevor St. John) tried to make it as an actor in Hollywood but succeeded only as an extra. To the residents of Cuba, Missouri, however, he's a star who's been on the same set as Jeff

FESTS

Bridges. On the basis of that perception, the troubled Van Horn is confident enough to set his sights on the popular girl ("Heaven's Prisoners'" Mary Stuart Masterson) he never got in high school, an action that brings him up against her white-trash boyfriend ("Swingers'" Jon Favreau). Badly acted for the most part—St. John is inexpressive to a fault, and Favreau overdoes the redneck bit—and flatly directed by George Hickenlooper ("The Low Life"), the film leaves little impression. Like Masterson's alcoholic character, it's mired in memories of the past, when the movies were better than "Dogtown."—Shlomo Schwartzberg

EXPECTATIONS ★★

Starring Lena Endre, Hans Klinga and Gunnel Lindblom. Directed by Daniel Bergman. Written by Reidar Jonnson. Produced by Waldemar Gerendahl and Kerstin Bonnier. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Swedish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Run time: 100 min.

Daniel Bergman's followup to his acclaimed "Sunday's Children," which won best first feature at the 1992 Montreal fest, is a banal series of vignettes of the lives of a diverse group of Swedes. The film, based on the short stories of scripter Reidar Jonnson, begins promisingly enough with footage of an American news reporter generalizing about the nature of Swedish women and feminism. But those expecting the film to either put the lie to or bolster the reporter's musings will be disappointed. Nothing that follows in the film has anything to do with that subject.

Instead, Bergman desultorily juggles his cast of characters, including a bickering couple whose daughter is caught in the middle of their marital strife, a married man and the divorced woman with whom he begins an affair, and a young man reluctantly returning to his hometown for a visit with his parents. But the connections among them are tenuous at best, and their plights are dull. At best, "Expectations" is nicely shot and acted.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

GEORGE B. ★

Starring David Morse, Nina Siemaszko, Grace Zabriskie and Brad Gregg. Directed and written by Eric Lea. Produced by Wade W. Danielson and Gloria Pryor. A Tango West production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy/drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 94 min.

Audiences are likely to ask an important question after spending time with "George B.": What's the point? Self-consciously quirky when not downright annoying, Eric Lea's debut feature falters badly in following the fortunes of a dim-witted rube ("The Crossing Guard's" David Morse) undermined by the manipulative young woman ("The Saint of Fort Washington's" Nina Siemaszko) he loves. Neither a low-budget "Forrest Gump" nor a contemporary "Of Mice and Men," the film has a narrative that doesn't bother with suggesting motivations for any of its characters.

Interest quickly wanes while watching the incomprehensible activities of the film's many oddball loners living in a particularly ugly California town. Lea, whose credits include editing on TV's "Seinfeld" and "Ink," also wrote this clunker. Much of the casting is atrocious. John Franklin goes higher than over the top as George's nervous pal, and Siemaszko never moves beyond a flirtatious smile. Grace Zabriskie, playing her mother, is wildly neurotic for the sake of neuroses.—Susan Green

A GIRL CALLED ROSEMARIE ★★★★

Starring Nina Hoss, Heiner Lauterbach, Matthieu Carriere and Til Schweiger. Directed by Bernd Eichinger. Written by Bernd Eichinger and Uwe Wilhelm. Produced by Bernd Eichinger and Uschi Reich. A Constantin production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 132 min.

Imagine Marilyn Monroe, Michael Rooker and Kevin Spacey together in a film reminiscent of both Mike Newell's "Dance With a Stranger" and Rainer Werner Fassbinder's "Lola." Similarly about a postwar-era prostitute with dark passions and foolhardy ambitions, "A Girl Called Rosemarie" features three primary cast members (Nina Hoss, Til Schweiger and Heiner Lauterbach) who often resemble, respectively, those American stars.

First-time director Bernd Eichinger—producer and distributor of the likes of "Smilla's Sense of Snow," "Das Boot," "The Neverending Story" and "In the Name of the Rose"—presents a taut fictional account of a genuine unsolved crime from the 1950s. In doing so, it employs Alex Berner's precise editing and crisp, occasionally Expressionist images shot by cinematographer Gernot Roll to observe the exploits of a young woman (Hoss, a blonde bombshell with a bit of an overbite) who tries to sleep her way into Frankfurt's upper echelons. Obsession clouds Rosemarie's horizon when, having survived her willful teenage years spent in and out of reformatories, she leaves the perpetually impoverished Tony (Schweiger) for a wealthy businessman (Lauterbach) engaged to someone of his own social status. After agreeing to participate in a blackmail scheme devised by a mysterious Frenchman (the sinuous Matthieu Carriere, a dead ringer for David Clennon of TV's "thirtysomething" fame), her downward spiral is hastened as the proceedings escalate into the realm of film noir.

Rosemarie's stubborn self-centeredness, sometimes conveyed with ferocious intensity by Hoss, never fades, but it does make room for just a hint of vulnerability. As much a commentary on the bourgeois hypocrisy of Germany's industrial miracle as it is a romantic tragedy, Eichinger's maiden voyage at the helm traverses familiar territory with a fresh outlook. "A Girl Called Rosemarie" is bleakness in a dazzling facade.—Susan Green

THE GLAMOROUS WORLD OF THE ADLON HOTEL ★★★

Starring Felix Adlon and Eva Mattes. Directed and written by Percy Adlon. Produced by Eleonore Adlon. A Pelemele/Leora production; no stateside distributor set. Documentary/docudrama. Not yet rated. Running time: 76 min.

"Bagdad Cafe" became a cult favorite in 1987 but, three years later, writer/director Percy Adlon fashioned the horrendous "Salmonberries." In "The Glamorous World of the Adlon Hotel," he salvages his reputation with a curious unearthing of family secrets. Adlon, who has made more than 50 documentaries, uses historical records, archival photographs, cunning reenactments and talking heads to recall a state-of-the-art Berlin establishment that once attracted the rich and famous.

The hotel magnate's cross-dressing playboy son, Louis Adlon (Felix Adlon, an offspring of Percy), leaves his posh Hollywood exile when William Randolph Hearst sends him to postwar Germany as a correspondent. Shocked into temporary sobriety, the young man files nostalgic stories for the San Francisco Examiner.

Although he has an ingenious method of investigating his roots, the elder Adlon marginalizes several key developments. Key among them is the unexplained death of Louis, who resumes his decadent lifestyle after he has a brief fling with meaningful work.—Susan Green

GOLD IN THE STREETS ★★★1/2

Starring Ian Hart, Jared Harris and Jim Belushi. Directed by Elizabeth Gill. Written by Janet Pearson and Noel Pearson. Produced by Noel Pearson. A Ferndale production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 96 min.

Many fans of Ian Hart ("Land and Freedom," "Backbeat") would gladly pay big bucks to watch him read the phone book. The acclaimed British actor, who regularly outshines the Brad Pitts and Tom Cruises of the world, once again radiates from the screen in a film about homesick Irish immigrants in New York City. "Gold in the Streets" puts Hart alongside some fine fellow thespians, especially Jared Harris ("Hurricane Streets"), in a cast that includes James Belushi as a pub owner.

Hart, as the depressed Des, shares a flat with his industrious cousin Owen (Harris), the America-loving Paddy (Tom Hickey) and a naive newcomer named Liam (Karl Geary). Three colleens across the hall have also joined this community of sorrowful Emerald Isle emigres caught between cultures. With her first theatrical feature, Dublin-born Elizabeth Gill, once an apprentice to Martin Scorsese and assistant to Todd Haynes, makes an engaging directorial debut, although it's grace notes that outnumber missteps, one of which is the movie's tendency to drag from time to time.—Susan Green

THE JAMES GANG ★★

Starring John Hannah, Helen McCrory and Toni Collette. Directed by Mike Barker. Written by Stuart Hepburn. Produced by Andrew Eaton. No stateside distributor set. Comedy/drama. Rated R for language and brief sexuality. Running time: 98 min.

Part of the rejuvenated slate of Hand-Made Films, "The James Gang" resembles Handmade's quirky movies only on the surface. Actually, this film about a family of petty criminals whose capers become a British cause celebre is a soft concoction, redeemed only by the strong performances of newcomer McCrory as the highly competent James Gang matriarch, Bernadette, and of Jason Flemyng ("Alive and Kicking") as Spendlove Junior, a boy who narrates his family's adventures.

Director Mike Barker, who's making his feature film debut, is tonally confused. The whimsy of Bill Forsyth coexists uneasily with the grit of Ken Loach. Not surprisingly, "The James Gang" never jells, preferring instead to loosely zigzag from one mood to another. The film's cleverest conceit, that it's the women who run the show, including a determined female cop ("Cosi's" Toni Collette) who's after the gang, isn't utilized with any wit or imagination. And the copout happy ending is shameful.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

LEVEL 5 ★★★

Starring Catherine Belkhodja. Directed and written by Chris Marker. Produced by Anatole Dauman. No stateside distributor set. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Running time: 90 min.

A Japanese woman, Laura, who lives in France, talks to the camera—and her dead lover—about her life, the World War II battle of Okinawa, and the nature of war and its current representation on the Internet.

Typically wide ranging as are all Chris Marker films ("Le Joli Mai," "Sans Soleil"), "Level 5" works on numerous levels. It's fiction, of course, because Laura is played by an actress. But it's also fact, as it analyzes cultural relations and racist attitudes between the Americans and Japanese during the war, including dramatic true-life testimony of atrocities committed by both sides. Laura also uses the 'Net to access video games based on the Okinawa battle, which shows how real events can be trivialized. But some of Laura's observations are trivial, too. Is Marker replicating triviality or actually being trivial himself?

"Level 5" poses conundrums like that throughout and, sometimes, that results in tedium; the Okinawa segues become increasingly tiresome. But the film is often hauntingly poetic, never more so than when Laura tells the story of a man she contacted on the Internet who said he was going to commit suicide the next day and of her desperate attempts to find out if his tale and intent were true. Marker's depiction of the computer as both a connecting and alienating device is layered and brilliant.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

THE OPIUM WAR ★★

Starring Shao Xin, Bao Gu'an, Williams Semon, Gao Yuan, Ema Graphis and Su Min. Directed by Xie Jin. Written by Zhu Sujin, Ni Zhen, Zong Fuxian and Mai Tianshu. Produced by Wu Baowen. An Opium War Film and TV Co. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 153 min.

Too much celluloid and dreadful performances betray "The Opium War," a tedious epic about British history in mid-19th century China that looks sumptuous, courtesy of cinematographer Hou Jong. When 74-year-old director Xie Jin's action-packed melodrama was screened before the return of Hong Kong to the People's Republic, it became the cinematic centerpiece of that festive reversal of fortune. Yet, apart from an exhausting length, the film's greatest sin is casting, particularly English-speaking roles.

Williams Semon offers archvillainy in his portrayal of a devious opium importer. Ema Graphis, as his daughter, will probably be best remembered for shrieking "Daddy!" upon seeing her papa in bed with a courtesan. The most illuminating issue—how the Brits forced opium on the Chinese—brings to mind contemporary allegations about the U.S. government's drug-pushing for financial and political gain. All sorts of other plot points go nowhere. Slowly.—Susan Green

POUR RIRE ★★★★★

Starring Jean-Pierre Leaud, Ornella Muti, Antoine Chappey and Tonie Marshall. Directed and written by Lucas Belvaux. Produced by Paulo Branco. A Gemini production; no distributor set. Comedy. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 100 min.

Although the title ("Just for a Laugh") suggests lighthearted fun, this snappy Parisian love triangle written and directed by Lucas Belvaux is tres, tres bittersweet. That becomes evident upon seeing the wonderfully hangdog face of Jean-Pierre Leaud, star of several Francois Truffaut pictures beginning with a childhood debut in "The 400 Blows" in 1959 and at least four by Jean-Luc Godard. It's a face—occasionally lined with age, incredibly boyish at other times and always reflecting melancholy eloquence—that almost eclipses the other talented actors on the screen.

Leaud is cast as Nicolas, who becomes something of a stalker after discovering that his fetching wife, Alice (Ornella Muti), is having an affair with a handsome sports journalist named Gaspard (Antoine Chappey). Another couple with romantic woes, Juliette and Michel (Tonie Marshall and Bernard Fau), serve as comic counterpoint, their problems further complicating the tense situation that Nicolas hopes to resolve. Alice, an attorney, is seen in court defending a man who has killed his adulterous spouse and her boyfriend. The entire City of Light appears to swirl around the movie's many broken-hearted souls.

"Pour Rire" is the second film made by Belvaux, previously a comic actor in work by Claude Chabrol and Jacques Rivette, among others. He finds just the right tone of sophisticated French je ne sais quois for this intricate web of prosperous professionals leading double lives, and every technical credit is sublime. With originality, Belvaux explores what commitment means in a world in which such things can be impossible to attain. He knows how to draw maximum laughter and tears from the human condition. Best of all, his black comedy presents a golden chance to watch Leaud's hilariously deadpan puss experience so much pleasure and pain.—Susan Green

PAJARICO ★★

Starring Alejandro Martinez, Paco Rabal and Juan Luis Galiardo. Directed and written by Carlos Saura. Produced by Javier Castro. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 105 min.

Spanish filmmaker Carlos Saura has fallen far since the filmic high of his superb, grippingly passionate "Carmen." His 30th film is a mundane coming-of-age film of a type seen many times before. Ten-year-old Manu (Alejandro Martinez) is sent to stay with his uncles and aunts in the country while his parents try to salvage their rocky marriage. Each week is spent with a different relative and, with each one, Manu becomes privy to a different aspect of their secret lives, including adultery, homosexuality and addiction. He also falls in love with a female cousin, who affects his future. Martinez is actually quite good as the somewhat naive Manu, but Saura fails to bring this young boy's adventures to life. Unlike classic films like "The 400 Blows" or "The Black Stallion," "Pajarico" lacks the indelible imagery that would make Manu's experiences special.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

SELF STORAGE ★★1/2

Starring Ron Leibman, Arye Gross and Joe Pantoliano. Directed by Tony Spiridakis. Written by Tony Spiridakis and Shem Bitterman. Produced by Randy Lippert. No stateside distributor set. Comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 91 min.

Another behind-the-scenes comedy about making it in Hollywood, "Self Storage" is enlivened by some very clever jokes and a robust performance by Ron Leibman as a failed actor who might also be a serial killer. But the film is decidedly uneven.

Arye Gross ("Mother Night") and Tom Wood play a down-and-out producing/writing team who stumble across Leibman, whom they suspect of being the dreaded "Costume Killer." Instead of turning him in to the cops, they use him as the basis of their new script, which causes them all sorts of trouble.

At its best, "Self Storage" skewers pretentious moguls who boast of casting key "talent" in silly shows. But the film is also overdone, and except for Leibman and Joe Pantoliano ("Bound"), who is very funny as a twitchy "producer," doesn't offer its cast much to do. A second or third draft would have helped.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

SOUL FOOD ★1/2

Starring Vanessa L. Williams, Vivica A. Fox and Nia Long. Directed and written by George Tillman Jr. Produced by Tracey E. Edmonds and Robert Teitel. A Fox release. Drama. Rated R for some strong sexuality and language. Running time: 114 min.

Kenneth "Babyface" Edmonds, one of the most successful music producers and songwriters of the decade, has made his first foray into producing for the bigscreen—and now has, unfortunately, a big, shiny dud to go alongside his shelves of Grammys.

With young writer/director George Tillman Jr. at the helm, "Soul Food" is the bland and passionless story of Mother Joe and her huge, extended Chicago family, which is always in conflict but manages to stay together under the sheer weight of her personality—not to mention her cooking: huge Sunday brunches complete with cornbread, greens, black-eyed peas, fresh fruit pies....

"Soul Food's" disjointed narrative, which attempts to tell about eight stories simultaneously, resembles a season's worth of television more than a movie. It implodes under the weight of every family and race cliche in the book, and it lacks the focus and originality that made such African-American films as "Boyz in the Hood" and "love jones" so appealing.—Jon Alon Walz

A THOUSAND ACRES ★★★1/2

Starring Jessica Lange, Michelle Pfeiffer, Jason Robards and Jennifer Jason Leigh. Directed by Jocelyn Moorhouse. Written by Laura Jones. Produced by Marc Abraham, Steve Golin, Lynn Arost, Kate Guinzburg and Sigurjon Sighvatsson. A Buena Vista release. Drama. Rated R for some strong sexual language. Running time: 106 min.

With its focus on letting go of the past to embrace the future, this adaptation of Jane Smiley's novel is thematically similar to director Jocelyn Moorhouse's last film, "How to Make an American Quilt." Both are chockful of characters with tragic histories who must release their anger and wistfulness if they are to move on. And some do with more success than others.

"A Thousand Acres" additionally addresses the role of greed in tying people to situations that ultimately make them more miserable than the material gain could possibly be worth. In this case, the prize in question is a thousand acres of fertile land, owned by third-generation superfarmer Larry Cook (Jason Robards), a man whose well-respected position in the community belies his cruelty toward his family.

Larry announces he will retire and split his beloved land among his three daughters, Ginny (Jessica Lange), Rose (Michelle Pfeiffer) and Caroline (Jennifer Jason Leigh). But he promptly shuts Caroline out of the deal when she inadvertently bruises the mercurial old man's feelings. And when Ginny, Rose and their husbands begin making plans as to how they will run the farm, the controlling Larry soon becomes resentful and bitter. He winds up teaming with Caroline to sue Ginny and Rose to get the farm back.

This heavy drama draws realistically complex characters and effectively shows how detrimental it can be to cling to the past and spend your time hating and blaming. Realism is maintained by resisting the urge to indulge in pat comeuppances and epiphanal revelations. Instead of sewing everything up neatly, the film presents a lot of unresolved emotional conflict and no easy answers as to what's right. How do you let go of a lifetime's worth of pain and anguish when the perpetrator doesn't even believe he's done anything wrong? "A Thousand Acres" offers much to ponder and excellent, well-rounded performances by Lange, Pfeiffer and Robards.—Christine James

THE GAME ★★1/2

Starring Michael Douglas, Sean Penn, James Rebhorn, Deborah Kara Unger and Armin Mueller-Stahl. Directed by David Fincher. Written by John Brancato and Michael Ferris. Produced by Steve Golin and Cean Chaffin. A Polygram release. Thriller. Rated R for language, and for some violence and sexuality. Running time: 128 min.

Making high-profile debuts this September, new major distributors DreamWorks ("The Peacemaker") and Polygram ("The Game") have both done themselves proud. Right from their openings, each film boasts an electricity to its genre exercise unusual for audience programmers. As mainstream entertainments, each must be considered a success. In the film-as-art category, however, it's "The Game" that pretends to have the reach, and it's here that the Propaganda production falls short.

Wealthy investment banker Nicholas Van Orton (Michael Douglas, in yet another someone's-out-to-get-me role) is not celebrating his 48th birthday. Although he's not a cruel man, he's estranged from virtually everyone in his life; so distant are his human contacts that most conversations he has are conducted by telephone. Into his memory, as he sits by himself in his San Francisco mansion, come recollections of the day of his father's 48th birthday—when the old man plunged from the home's high roof to his death before the boy's eyes. Into his life, at a lunch at a posh restaurant, returns younger brother Conrad (Sean Penn), long a failure at anything except getting into trouble. Conrad gives Nicholas a present: a gift certificate for something called The Game. As Nicholas tries to find out more about how you play this Game, the world that was his own begins to play him dangerously.

As with his "Seven," in "The Game" it's in his climax where director David Fincher fails. Both films build toward dynamic, even world-altering conclusions, but what's provided is just fizzle. In the end, "Seven" proved to be merely a hijacking of biblical precepts that made for script salability but only shallow execution. Fincher opens this film with truly affecting home-movie footage of the young Nicholas with his distant father. It's a well-done sequence that with surprisingly deep authenticity establishes the movie's question to be answered. But what "The Game" does in providing its surprises, however engaging, is to not just avoid but even trash the life-and-death importance of the emotional makeup of its lead. Once again, Fincher opts for artifice over art.—Kim Williamson

JULIAN PO ★★

Starring Christian Slater. Directed and written by Alan Wade. Produced by Jon Glascoe and Joseph Pierson. A Fine Line release. Drama. Rated PG-13 for thematic elements related to suicide, and for language and some sensuality. Run time: 83 min.

Nothing stirs up a cinematic small town like the arrival of a stranger. His very presence upsets the delicate balance of personalities and priorities that the local yokels have forged during years of isolation. In "Julian Po," a film set in one such crossroads of civilization, those citizens include a gruff mayor, a gun-mad sheriff and his good-cookin' wife, a kooky minister, an unstable landlord and his deaf/mute (or is she?) housekeeper, and the standard-issue wistful young maiden. They've all spent eons together without incident.

So when 30-year-old Julian Po (Christian Slater) rents a room in this village without visitors, he attracts loads of suspicion-laden attention—until Julian informs his new neighbors why he's there: to kill himself. In a flash, xenophobia turns to admiration for this man of conviction, someone who plans to put his gun where his mouth is. Julian, who moved into Nowheresville to be left alone, receives a personal call from everyone in town; they confess their darkest secrets, give him haircuts and corn muffins, request guidance, or simply bask in his notoriety. The idea behind this movie is that through Julian these poor sods can find their true selves.

But, as trite as it sounds, we never get to know Julian's visitors beyond their broadly drawn dramatic roles. Perhaps if the film concentrated on just a few characters, rather than an entire townful, there'd be sufficient room to explore the chosen with appropriate depth. As it stands, the audience watches a parade of personalities while wondering, "Who are these people, and who cares?" The same goes for Julian, a man we learn almost nothing about.—Ian Hodder

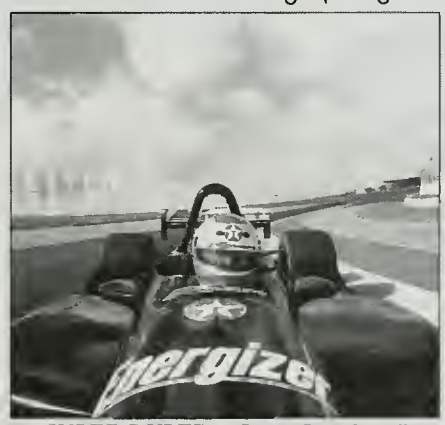
FIRE DOWN BELOW ★★1/2

Starring Steven Seagal, Marg Helgenberger and Harry Dean Stanton. Directed by Felix Enriquez Alcala. Written by Jeb Stuart and Philip Morton. Produced by Steven Seagal and Julius R. Nasso. A Warner Bros. release. Action. Rated R for violence and language. Running time: 99 minutes.

There are two ways to view Steven Seagal's latest fist fest, "Fire Down Below." First is as a by-the-numbers actioner that hits most of its marks, including a juicy justification of a plot (scummy corporate type stores his chemical waste in abandoned mines, sickening an Appalachian town's children), strong supporting characters ("Species'" Marg Helgenberger as the town outcast, Harry Dean Stanton as a sage bumpkin, and raisin-faced Kris Kristofferson doing his "Lone Star" villain, this time in pinstripes), and spectacular (if chaotic) scenes of destruction.

The Seagal/Nasso production even gets country authenticity thanks to appearances by Travis Tritt and Randy Travis, among others. The second way is even more fun: "Fire Down Below" as a God vs. the Devil scenario in which Seagal casts himself as the ultimate justice-doer—a pursed-lipped, pony-tailed, leather-blazered version of the Almighty. When Seagal's undercover EPA agent Jack Taggart first arrives in Jackson, Ky., in the guise of a church handyman, he tells the townsfolk that he's doing "God's work." From there on, references to heaven and hell fall like frogs during the Apocalypse. ("Fire down below," geddit?)

The God comparison was inevitable. Seagal's action heroes aren't like those of other franchisees like Bruce Willis or Mel Gibson, who thrill by being regular guys who triumph against the odds, getting bruised in the process. With Seagal, there's no question he's going to kick ass without even breaking a sweat. The tension comes not from knowing whether he'll win, but how quickly and by what means, whether it's against 10 hillbilly bruisers at once or two thigh-sized rattlers—the latter of which he just grabs in each hand as they strike.



If only Eve had had that kind of coordination.—Melissa Morrison

SPECIAL FORMATS

SUPER SPEEDWAY ★★★

Featuring Mario Andretti and Michael Andretti. Narrated by Paul Newman. Directed by Stephen Low. Produced by Pietro L. Serapiglia. A Stephen Low Co. release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 48 min. Format: IMAX.

In the documentary-as-spectacle/thrill ride subgenre, the IMAX format really can't be beat. From fish to civilization, all subjects receive a visceral swoop-and-dive camera treatment at some point. But "Super Speedway" could just be the most perfect match of subject matter to aspect ratio since the debut of the eight-story screen. Indy race cars, in all their hard-turning, stomach-churning, 230 mph glory have now been captured on celluloid from a driver's-eye view. The result is a white-knuckle film that feels like it ages the viewer the four years it took to produce.

In an amazing technical and logistical accomplishment (attaching a big bulky camera to a light streamlined car and driving very fast on a racetrack full of competitors), "Super Speedway" follows the fortunes of racer Michael Andretti and his newly designed car through the 1996 race season while his father, legend Mario Andretti, reflects on his career and the history of the sport and a midwestern race car buff carefully restores an early '60s Indy roadster. Stock footage illustrates the evolution of racer design (along with fatal crashes of the end product) while time-lapse photography shows the computer-controlled design and fabrication of today's super machines.

Director Stephen Low does a good job of keeping things interesting, although traditional IMAX shortcomings—stilted dialogue passages and over-pretty staged reenactments—pop up here and there. Although the historical and personal asides are nice enough, it's the race footage that is the film's raison d'etre and its main selling point. Here, "Super Speedway" is right on the money. Camera car driver/operator Mario Andretti captures some truly jaw-dropping scenes, which are effectively combined with an amplified stereophonic roar of the engines. The film delivers what it promises: one hell of a thrill ride.—Alex Albanese

What BOXOFFICE said about...

THE ABSENT-MINDED PROFESSOR

[In May 1961, Walt Disney released a live-action family marvel, "The Absent-Minded Professor," which proved similar in style, setting and success to its "The Shaggy Dog" of two years previous. On 11/26, Disney (as with last year's "101 Dalmatians") delves into its rich canon for a remake, this time called "Flubber" and with Robin Williams riding in the Fred MacMurray role. Here's what BOXOFFICE said about the original.]

Walt Disney follows up his 1959 blockbusting "The Shaggy Dog" with another modest-budget, black-and-white live-action comedy that bids fair to break records in 1961. All the popular ingredients are present: Fred MacMurray is again starred, this time as a zany scientist who invents a rubbery substance, which he names "flubber"; the script by Bill "Shaggy" Walsh, based on a Samuel Taylor story, is another fantasy in a small-town setting; and Robert Stevenson has directed in a broad, Mack Sennett-like fashion that will have audiences howling as MacMurray's flubber has people and an old flivver bouncing sky-high. With Tommy Kirk, Disney's teenage regular, and both Keenan and Ed Wynn (in a guest appearance in his old role of a befuddled fire chief) for extra marquee draw, this is ideal family fare to delight youngsters and adults alike. There's even a few puzzled-looking dogs and the "Shaggy Dog" cops, James Westerfield and Forrest Lewis, for added laughs—what more could exhibitors want? MacMurray is well cast as the professor, and Nancy Olson registers charm and exasperation nicely as his waiting-at-the-altar fiancee. Keenan Wynn as a loan shark and Kirk as his fumbling son couldn't be better.

EXPLOITIPS:

Although dogs are in the minority in this film, stress the similarity to "The Shaggy Dog" by playing up Fred MacMurray and Tommy Kirk, who starred in it. Kirk is also currently starred in "Swiss Family Robinson." Advertise for an old Model-T, such as is used in the film, and display it in the lobby to attract attention. Mention that Ed Wynn is seen in his familiar Fire Chief role.

CATCHLINES:

You'll be "Flubbergasted" at Fred MacMurray's New Adventures ... He Left His Fiancee Waiting at the Church But He Won Her Back With a "Flubber."

KULL THE CONQUEROR ★★★

Starring Kevin Sorbo, Tia Carrere, Harvey Fierstein and Karina Lombard. Directed by John Nicolella. Written by Charles Edward Pogue. Produced by Raffaella De Laurentiis. A Universal release. Adventure. Rated PG-13 for fantasy action violence and sensuality. Running time: 96 min.

A fond and energetic return to the Italian muscle-hero epics of the 1960s, "Kull the Conqueror" is a guilty pleasure of rare quality. The spirit rather than the letter of Robert E. Howard's short stories (mainly the 1929 "By This Axe I Rule!") has been captured with a lively sense of old-fashioned mythical hokum in a script by Charles Edward Pogue ("Dragonheart"). Naturally, the plot has as many holes and absurd contrivances as Howard's tall tales, but the moviemakers' clear affection for its source keeps the film diverting in a corny way.

With irreverent dash and charm, Kevin Sorbo (best known from TV's "Hercules: The Legendary Journeys") admirably fills out the muscular title role—an ancient warrior and progenitor of Conan the Barbarian who's deposed as king of Valusia by a treacherous evil sorceress ("High School High's" Tia Carrere, who truly seems to enjoy being bad). So Kull sets off on an ocean voyage with his lady love ("Legend of the Fall's" Karina Lombard, who here proves enchanting) and a loyal fighting companion (a dignified Litefoot, last seen in "The Indian in the Cupboard") to find a supernatural power that will destroy the fiend and restore peace to his land.

Loaded with brawny action, mysterious locales, hair-breadth escapes and anachronistic tongue-in-cheek humor, this is one lusty adventure fantasy that does not rely on computer effects. Even the suggestions of nudity, sexuality and violence are handled with creative discretion. Colorful turns by Roy Brocksmith as an eccentric king's adviser and Harvey Fierstein ("Independence Day") as an old friend of Kull's who turns traitor further the film's myriad delights.

The brisk pace and imaginative visual atmosphere created by debut feature director John Nicolella (TV's "Nash Bridges"), aided by Benjamin Fernandez's witty production design and Rodney Charters' lavish Panavision photography, help the silly fun to stay on its feet. Only those without a sense of wonder or appreciation of legendary nonsense should avoid crossing into this kingdom.—Dale Winogura

EXCESS BAGGAGE ★★★

Starring Alicia Silverstone, Benicio Del Toro and Christopher Walken. Directed by Marco Brambilla. Written by Max D. Adams and Dick Clement & Ian La Frenais. Produced by Bill Borden and Carolyn Kessler. A Columbia release. Action/drama. Rated PG-13 for violence, drinking and sex-related dialogue. Running time: 101 min.

"Excess Baggage," the first film from the First Kiss production company of Alicia Silverstone (last seen in "Batman & Robin"), is packed with a clever premise and interesting characters played by fabulous actors, not to mention pleasantly quirky bits and an overall good feeling. So why—despite the great packing job—is the trip itself so oddly ill-focused, unfulfilling and ultimately nowhere-bound?

Silverstone stars as poor little rich girl Emily, who, in a desperately misguided attempt to win her shady businessman father's love, stages her own kidnapping. But her well-planned rescue and hoped-for tearful reconciliation with dear papa runs afoul when a bizarre, professional car thief, Vincent ("The Usual Suspects'" Benicio Del Toro), steals her car with a bound-and-gagged Emily hiding in the trunk. Of course, the two initially dislike each other, but the distinct trouble they both find themselves in leads them to, of course, bond.

Silverstone proves a savvy selector of very interesting material and she does good business here, finding and playing a teenage character who is both awkwardly bold and childishly capable, although her trademark pout is becoming quite tired. Del Toro is a wonder to behold as the hand-gesturing, simple-minded, in-way-over-his-head, well-meaning car thief. And any movie that casts the creative Christopher Walken ("Last Man Standing") as a caring, albeit gun-toting, father figure is worth three stars on that action alone.

Despite the cast's obvious charm, though, the script promises a film that never materializes. Payoffs for setups never appear and the movie stays on the surface, never delving deep enough into the heart of the matter to ever matter. The filmmakers have the right idea but the wrong execution. Director Marco Brambilla ("Demolition Man") lacks the point of view necessary to invest the film with those ever-important, but always difficult, emotional stakes. Still, culpability for this charming failure is difficult to lay, particularly on a film that clearly screams out to be a low-budget, independent effort and yet has a studio stamp all over it. Regardless, Silverstone should pack her bags again because, at the tender age of 20, she's responsible for the most frustrating and intriguing film to come out of Sony all year.—Susan Lambert

Starring Laurence Fishburne, Tim Roth, Andy Garcia, Vanessa Williams and Cicely Tyson. Directed by Bill Duke. Written by Chris Brancato. Produced by Frank Mancuso Jr. A UA release. Drama. Rated R for graphic gangster violence, strong language, a scene of sexuality and some nudity. Running time: 134 min.

Filmmakers love gangsters, and none with more affection than those legendary Depression-era dukes of debauchery Lucky Luciano, Dutch Schultz, Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky. Unfortunately, such efforts as "Bugsy," "The Cotton Club," "Mobsters" and "Billy Bathgate" have so overexposed the characters and their milieu that separating truth from myth might well be a long-lost cause. All of that helps explain why the makers of "Hoodlum" chose to shift their focus onto Harlem's own Ellsworth "Bumpy" Johnson, a lesser-known, though no less instrumental, figure of the era. Laurence Fishburne's Johnson does indeed cut a compelling figure, but overlong and lackluster writing and uninspired direction relegate "Hoodlum" to the bottom rung of American gangster epics.

Essentially a flat-out gang warfare picture with Johnson and Schultz (Tim Roth) battling for control of the lucrative Harlem numbers racket, "Hoodlum" is an ambitious film that seeks to educate as much as entertain, weaving broad socio-political statements among intermittent gunplay. But the messages are as simplistic as the film's history is revisionist, painting Johnson as a hometown hero of the Robin Hood variety, despite proclamations by friends and associates to the contrary.

Despite the pitfalls of Chris Brancato's convention-laden script, most of the performers manage to extract relatively persuasive portrayals, with Chi McBride a noteworthy standout as Johnson's cousin Illinois Gordon. Roth's campy, slobbish take on Schultz, on the other hand, ranges from amusing to embarrassing, while Vanessa Williams is wasted in a pointless romantic subplot.

Having successfully dealt with similar material on "A Rage in Harlem," it's surprising that director Bill Duke fails to ignite even the flavor of the period. Instead, Duke's direction is frustratingly forced, relying on booming Elmer Bernstein crescendos and sweeping crane shots to inject emotion where there is none.

Even hoodlums deserve better.—Wade Major

STEEL ★★1/2

Starring Shaquille O'Neal, Annabeth Gish, Richard Roundtree and Judd Nelson. Directed and written by Kenneth Johnson. Produced by Quincy Jones, David Salzman and Joel Simon. A Warner Bros. release. Action. Rated PG-13 for some superhero action violence. Running time: 105 min.

With the help of a couple of friends, an ex-military metallurgist, John Henry Irons ("Kazaam's" Shaquille O'Neal), sets out to clean up his neighborhood and stop the sale of high-tech weapons to terrorists. Armed with a tricked-out sledgehammer and bulletproof armor, Irons is about to let the crime element know that Los Angeles is now under the protection of Steel.

This action-filled special effects-induced movie is loosely based on a character from a DC Comics Superman story. Steel is a combination of Robocop and Meteor Man. Child audiences are given a hero who blunders enough to show that he is human while appearing to be strong enough to get the job done with comic-book armaments. As the smoke clears, though, this film closely resembles an elaborate pilot for a possible TV series, meaning that's it's just the young ones, especially males, who'll enjoy this film.—*Dwayne E. NATIONAL NEWS

NEWS CORP. GETS NEW REGENCY

In September, News Corp.'s Fox Filmed Entertainment acquired an estimated $200 million stake in Arnon Milchan's New Regency Prods., which has been under Warner Bros.' wing for the last six years. When talks between New Regency and Warner Bros. broke down last July over Time Warner refusing to take a larger equity stake in Milchan's expanded entertainment company, New Regency went looking for a new home. New Regency is just the latest of significant production companies recently acquired by Fox, who also brought over producer Arnold Kopelson from Warner Bros.

New Regency has produced 31 films over the past five years, including "L.A. Confidential," "Devil's Advocate" and "Goodbye, Lover." Other Warner Bros./New Regency productions include "A Time to Kill," "The Client," "Free Willy" and "Natural Born Killers." There are still approximately 10 projects coming down the pipeline that the production company and Warner Bros. will co-own along with any sequels to previous films. New Regency will officially relocate to the Fox lot on June 1, 1998. Under the new agreement, Fox Filmed Entertainment will distribute all New Regency product worldwide, including theatrical, video, licensing, merchandising and domestic television, although international television is excluded.

New Regency president and CEO David Matalon can now turn his attention to filling the void left when chairman and CEO Michael Nathanson left this past February to become president of MGM Pictures. Matalon has said he would not bring in a new CEO but that the company would instead hire a president of production.

UNIVERSAL SHARES THE COST

Universal Pictures looks like it's about to make good on its announcement this May that it hoped to co-finance future pictures. In what would be the first such arrangement for a formalized package of pictures, the studio is in deep negotiations on a co-financing deal with Gary Levinsohn and Mark Gordon's Mutual Film Co. The deal reportedly involves five pictures valued at a total of $350 million. Insiders say the deal could include upcoming films "Age of Aquarius" from filmmaker Phil Alden Robinson to star Harrison Ford; the sci-fic thriller "Virus"; and "Black Dog," an action film for Kevin Sorbo.

Universal has had success with co-financing deals on single pictures, such as "12 Monkeys," "The Relic" and "Hard Rain."

Mutual, which used to be known as Cloud Nine Entertainment, has four overseas partners: England's BBC, Japan's Toho-Towa/Maubeni, Germany's TeleMunchen and France's UGC. As part of the agreement, the partners would acquire the foreign rights for their own territories.

VOGEL TAKES ON HOLLYWOOD

David Vogel, who has presided over Walt Disney Pictures for the past four years, has added the title of president of the revived Hollywood Pictures. Under the new arrangement, Vogel and the Walt Disney staff will produce up to four adult-targeted films per year for distribution under the Hollywood Pictures banner, while still producing six family films under the Disney label each year.

Walt Disney Studios in 1996 said it was closing Hollywood Pictures as a development and production entity. The banner was kept open to distribute Simpson/Bruckheimer and Scott Free films. Hollywood Pictures will now also be used to distribute films produced by Walt Disney Pictures that aren't appropriate for release under that nameplate.

To begin production shortly and fall under this new arrangement is "A Small Miracle" (based on John Irving's novel, "A Prayer for Owen Meany"), from writer/director Mark Steven Johnson (writer for "Grumpy Old Men") and producers Roger Birnbaum, Laurence Mark and John Baldecchi. Vogel also signed his first exclusive deal for Hollywood Pictures with Johnson and producer Gary Foster ("Tin Cup") and their production company, Horseshoe Bay.

EAST VS. WEST: THE WGA WAR

After a bitter debate, the Writers Guild of America West voted to ratify a new film and television contract in mid-September. Late that month, the 2,435-member East Coast unit shouted "cut," with a resounding 490 votes against the pact and only 99 in favor.

The three-year pact had won approval by only 375 votes from the WGA's much-larger West Coast unit. In one of the highest turnouts in history, 34 percent of the WGA West's 7,913 members cast ballots, with 1,530 in favor of ratification and 1,155 opposed. The final combined tally thus stands at 1,645 con and 1,629 pro. TV/film producers and the WGA have seven months to reach an agreement (the guild's current contract expires May 2, 1998), but some members believe that a strike is not only possible but likely.

Detractors of the new contract say the agreement does not address important foreign and cable residuals and the possessory credit issue and threatens to decimate the guild's health fund. Daniel Petrie Jr., who has been voted in as guild president and is a fierce advocate of the new contract, claims the provisions of the pact are strong enough; he is one voice forecasting a strike. Writer Petrie ("Beverly Hills Cop") has said his first goal is to reunify the guild, which has been sorely split over the contract issue. His goal might be difficult to achieve: The president of the WGA East and five former presidents have all come out against the contract.

Many guild members are unhappy with WGA West executive director and chief negotiator Brian Walton. WGA West board member Larry Gelbart and former WGA West president Frank Pierson said Walton sold out the writers on the terms and then misused his power to mail postcards, using guild funds, that told members to ratify the contract. But former WGA West president George Kirgo defends Walton, who has served as executive director for 12 years, a term that includes the 1988 writers' strike.

THE LION'S LOST FIVE YEARS

In preparation for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc.'s long-anticipated initial public offering, the corporation filed a $250 million stock offering prospectus with the Securities and Exchange Commission that showed the studio has lost $1.7 billion over the past five years. MGM has not shown an operating profit since 1988, the filing says, and the studio doesn't expect to show one "for at least several years."

The French government agency, Consortium de Realisation (CDR), sold the studio last year to Kirk Kerkorian, Australia's Seven Network and MGM management led by chairman Frank Mancuso. Despite the perception that Kerkorian and Seven were equal partners on the deal, the prospectus shows Kerkorian holds control over MGM. Kerkorian, who first purchased MGM in 1969, proceeded to sell off many assets and then sold the studio to Italian financier Giancarlo Parretti in 1990, holds 68 percent of the MGM stock in the aftermath of the reacquisition. But, according to the filing, Kerkorian, Seven and Mancuso have a joint voting arrangement that restricts Kerkorian's ability to act alone. The filing did not reveal how many shares will be sold and at what price, but MGM hopes to raise a net amount of $232 million from the offering and use that money to repay existing debt, which stands at more than $800 million.

The prospectus outlines MGM's future production plans and financial strategy. It plans to produce and distribute 10-12 pictures per year and release an additional four to six specialty films through Goldwyn, which was acquired with Orion Pictures in July. Additionally, the filing says MGM, unlike many other studios, does not plan to sign many first-look deals with producers and will make fewer large-budget event pictures than other major studios. MGM also does not plan to pre-sell foreign rights to most of its movies.

The filing showed annual losses ranging from $241 million in 1992 to $345 million in 1993. In 1996, despite such successes as "Leaving Las Vegas," "The Birdcage" and "Goldeneye," MGM posted a $90.5 million loss. In the first half of this year, MGM released only three new features domestically, compared with 12 films released in the same period for 1996. MGM's underwriters, Merrill Lynch and J.P. Morgan, plan to take the offering to the market in late October. Some Wall Street insiders say the brand name alone will sell, but others say investors are likely to be wary, due to the financial profile.

MO' MIRAMAX SHUFFLE

Miramax Films co-chairmen Harvey and Bob Weinstein have promoted Cary Granat to president of Dimension Films, the genre banner started up four years ago. Granat, who was previously head of production for Dimension, will continue to report to Bob Weinstein and oversee all films released under the Dimension label.

Granat is currently overseeing such upcoming Dimension projects as "Senseless," a comedy directed by Penelope Spheeris, and both a prequel and sequel to "From Dusk Till Dawn." Dimension also bought the sequel and remake rights to "Rambo" and "Total Recall." Before joining Miramax, Granat served as director of development at Universal Pictures.

AMC SELLS 17 MEGAPLEXES, LEASES THEM BACK

In a strategy to generate income to pay off debt and build more theatres, AMC Entertainment Inc. is selling 17 of its largest megaplexes for a total of $384 million, and then leasing them back. The buyer is Entertainment Properties Trust, a publicly traded real estate trust currently being formed. The trust will lease the theatres back to AMC immediately after the purchase, so operations will remain the same, without interruption. Among the theatres involved in the sale are the Grand 24 in Dallas and the Ontario Mills 30-plex, both of which grabbed headlines for being the largest of their size in North America at the time of their openings.

GO WESTWOOD, YOUNG MANN

Mann Theatres, which operates all the theatres in L.A.'s trendy Westwood Village, is close to closing a deal with Regent Properties to build a multiplex in the Beverly Hills-based developer's planned retail center to be located in the northwest end of Westwood Village. Regent and Mann recently teamed on the Glendale Marketplace in Glendale, Calif., due to open in March 1998, in which Mann will have a four-plex. Mann is also in talks to build a multiplex in developer Ira Smedra's proposed Westwood Village complex, to the consternation of local residents, who cite parking and overcrowding concerns as the reasons for their opposition to the project. A Westwood Village mandate restricts the total number of movie theatre seats to 6,030; Mann will be closing some of its other theatres in the area to comply with this regulation.

DICKINSON REACHES SUMMIT

The Lee's Summit City Council has approved plans for Dickinson Theatres to build a 16-screen theatre and entertainment center in Lee's Summit, Mo., according to Wood Dickinson, president and CEO of Dickinson Operating Co. The 52,000-square-foot center will feature a centrally located computerized boxoffice and a variety of auditorium sizes ranging from 120 to 450 seats, for a total of 3,000 seats. All auditoriums will have Dickinson's RockerStadium seating, as well as DTS, Dolby SR-D and Sony SDDS digital stereo systems and Lucasfilm's THX sound system.

IMAX ANNOUNCES 20-PICTURE PRODUCTION SLATE

Toronto-based Imax Corp., provider of large-format film technology and titles, has announced a staggering slate of 20 films the company will be producing over the next several years. In addition to the high-profile projects the company has recently embarked upon, such as the "Mission to Mir" NASA documentary and the collaboration with Paramount on a 3-D "Star Trek" short, coming up for Imax will be such films as "The Imax Nutcracker," "Africa's Elephant Kingdom," "T. Rex: Back to the Cretaceous," "Extreme" (about extreme sports), and "Island of the Sharks." Some of Imax's most successful titles have been the Val Kilmer starrer "Wings of Courage" and "Across the Sea of Time," which explores the fourth dimension in the third dimension. Please see Boxoffice's feature story, "The Big Time," on page 54 for an in-depth look at Imax.

SHOWMANDISER PROMOTION OF THE MONTH

For "shear" creativity, you can't top Michigan's Star Gratiot Theatre promotions manager Bill McDaniel. Also featured in our September Showmandiser, McDaniel is back in our pages for his razor-sharp promotion of "G.I. Jane" that generated a lot of buzz. Buzz cuts, that is. McDaniel offered six-month VIP passes to any woman who would volunteer to have her head shaved a la "Jane" star Demi Moore in the Star Gratiot's lobby on the night of the movie's opening. Five bold women soon became five bald women as they dared to doff their hair, with the proceedings aired live on local FM dance station WDRQ. The event became a "media circus," says McDaniel, with "wall-to-wall people gawking at the shavees," as well as all four TV networks in the Detroit area in attendance to tape the event for their 10 and 11 o'clock news. As a showman, it's obvious that Bill McDaniel is simply a cut above the rest.

REGAL BUYS 78 R/C SCREENS

Continuing the rapid expansion of its theatrical kingdom, Regal Cinemas has announced the signing of a definitive asset purchase agreement with R/C Theatres for the purchase of 10 theatres with 78 screens in Virginia. "The concentration of these theatres in Virginia complements our 1995 acquisition of 76 screens in the state from Neighborhood Entertainment Inc.," said Regal president and CEO Mike Campbell. Among the chains Regal has most recently acquired are Cobb Theatres, Magic Cinemas and Krikorian Premiere Theatres. Regal, one of the country's fastest-growing theatre chains, currently has 2,082 screens in operation at 235 locations, ranking it as the third-largest theatre circuit in North America.

PMG TEAMS WITH APPLAUSE

In-theatre promotional product distributor Promotional Management Group (PMG) has entered into an agreement with toy merchandiser Applause Inc. Under the joint venture, the two companies will provide theatres with movie-themed toy premiums that will be exclusive to the exhibition market. PMG's current product line includes movie graphic collectible drinking cups, popcorn bags, popcorn tubs and kids' trays.

Q&A: THE LOEW-DOWN ON LOEWS

With their five-year contract set to expire Dec. 1, Loews co-chairs Jim and Barrie Lawson Loeks have decided not to renew the agreement, opting instead to focus their attentions on the circuit they founded, the Michigan-based Loeks-Star. Loeks-Star, which currently has 118 screens, all in Michigan, is owned and operated by the Loeks in a joint venture with Loews parent Sony, though the circuit retains its separate identity. Expansion plans for Loeks-Star call for nearly doubling the circuit's size, requiring the Loeks' full-time energies to be devoted to its development. Loews president Travis Reid lauds the contributions of the Loeks and tells BOXOFFICE of Loews' plans to expand upon the innovations they implemented during their tenure.

BOXOFFICE: How will your responsibilities change now that the Loeks have stepped down as co-chairs?

TRAVIS REID: I probably won't know until we've done it for a while exactly how different it is. Theatre design has always been something that Jim and Barrie, particularly Jim, have been really strong in. There's some basic things about [the theatres Jim designed] that lend themselves toward efficient operation in customer service. For instance, most of the buildings have entrances front and back, of basically equal size. That's just a small, basic thing that right off the bat gets the customer into your building easier. And then Jim's adaptation of [the previous prototype] design when we went to the stadium seating and the larger screen counts, the bigger buildings, has been greatly successful for us in our newer theatres. That's one area that I'll really be needing to step up my own involvement. We've worked very much as a team, but everybody had their strengths. And we're trying to fill the gaps.

BOXOFFICE: What were the Loeks' other innovations?

REID: The two major areas that changed under the Loeks are the physical buildings that we were constructing—they've gotten much larger, much more state-of-the-art, much more operation- and customer-friendly—and then the customer service programs that were installed. And we're absolutely committed to retaining those, and we'll hopefully continue to find innovative ways to even expand upon them.

BOXOFFICE: Are there some new innovations that you have in mind to improve the theatregoing experience?

REID: We are all working together right now on a new prototype theatre. And within that prototype we want to continue to expand our food services. Perhaps form some strategic alliances with other compatible businesses—restaurants, game companies, book stores, other retail tenants that we think add to a theatre environment.

BOXOFFICE: What is the status of the merger with Cineplex?

REID: I can only tell you that it's still in negotiations. [The deal was subsequently announced Sept. 30; see our next issue for coverage—Ed.]

BOXOFFICE: Can you talk about some of the challenges that would come with running the world's largest theatre circuit?

REID: We'd have a lot more territory to become conversant with, a lot more buildings to evaluate and make sure that we feel that we're managing them properly, keeping them as up to date as we can. More territory to be aggressive regarding our expansion. I think there are a lot of challenges to blend the two philosophies as efficiently as we can and keep what each company is doing best and blend it.

BOXOFFICE: Where is exhibition headed in the future?

REID: We're into the era where you need to differentiate yourself. And the best forms of differentiation in most markets are to make sure that you've got the largest number of screens possible to be able to accommodate a wide variety of both product type and showtimes. Premium presentation—you need to provide stadium seating, very large screens, the best sound available, and extraordinary customer service.

BOXOFFICE: What is most exciting to you about exhibition?

REID: It's the rapid growth curve that we're all in. The fact that we've discovered the exponential attendance that you get from these megacomplexes has really changed the expansion plan to where you can look at a market differently. A market that two years ago you would have considered to be fully built out now looks like an opportunity, if it's really filled with less-than-superior facilities. The most exciting thing right now is the expansion opportunities.—Christine James

PIRATES OF THE VOLGA

MOSCOW—The Russian government appears to be succeeding in reining in piracy. And Hollywood, whose products are the prime targets for unauthorized use in Russia, seems satisfied with the success. Major studios sent representatives to the Moscow Film Festival in July, ending a six-year boycott prompted by an unofficial television broadcast of "Die Hard 2."

Meanwhile, Hollywood's crusader in Washington, Motion Picture Association head Jack Valenti, put his stamp of approval on Russian efforts after visiting with Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin during the festival. The meeting was followed by Chernomyrdin's announcement of the establishment of a Foreign Ministry department aimed specifically at diminishing piracy of films, videos and television programs. The new department will accelerate Russia's strategy to combat piracy, such as the strengthening of copyright laws.

Following the collapse of communism in 1989, Western products flooded a market that didn't have the legal and economic mechanisms in place to regulate it. The thirst for previously forbidden films and the country's massive size (300 million people) quickly made Russia a hotbed of piracy. Video pirates were estimated to control 99 percent of the market, and it was not uncommon for a video release to follow a theatrical release by mere days, causing legitimate boxoffice to suffer. New laws as well as the establishment last autumn of Moscow's first multiplex, the Kodak Kino Mir, are credited with cutting into pirates' share and improving admissions.

TAX CUTS FOR LOW BUDGETS

LONDON—Already experiencing a high, the British film industry was further boosted by the new Labour government's announcement of tax incentives for filmmakers and the creation of a culture task force. The tax incentives, which were announced in July, are estimated to be worth a total of $50 million annually. They will allow films with budgets less than $25 million to take a 100 percent write-off on their production and acquisition costs. The films must also meet requirements set under the 1985 Films Act, which define what constitutes a "British" movie. As a result, the break is expected to encourage more films by British filmmakers to be shot on British soil rather than abroad. The industry had long sought the changes, which are modeled on the tax laws of other European countries. The changes come as U.K. production is exceptionally strong, with 53 films made in the first half of the year, an eight percent increase over the same period last year, as well as vigorous activity by American productions filming in Britain.

The government also introduced a task force of eight members from creative industries, including fashion, publishing and music. The film sector is represented by Sir David Puttnam, filmmaker and former Hollywood studio head; and Richard Branson, the man behind the Virgin Group, owner of Virgin cinemas and a partner in the Film Co., one of the country's innovative new studio franchises. The panel will discuss ways to improve the financial prospects of the country's entertainment and leisure industries.

ANTONIA'S WHINE

AMSTERDAM—Shamed by the dismal local boxoffice for 1996 Oscar winner "Antonia's Line," a home-grown film, the Dutch government is initiating a series of supports for the local film industry. Among them is an 18 percent increase in annual funding for production to $16.8 million; the establishment of a new cultural bureau that will coordinate private funds with needy projects; and tax breaks for private investors through the creation of new mutual funds. "Antonio's Line," despite the international attention it got when it won the Academy Award for Best Foreign Film, was seen by only 120,000 people in the Netherlands.

Ironically, the Dutch cultural representative to the European Union was among those who rejected plans for a subsidy fund for film production that would have allotted $67.7 million to pan-European productions. The Dutch rep joined the German and Swedish representatives in saying that such a fund would not make a significant difference. The project was intended to be a counterpart to the European Union's MEDIA program—intended to promote European filmmaking—which funds training for film-industry personnel and such elements as a film's distribution and screening. MEDIA's latest project is a just-announced $4 million in loans to 135 independent production companies.

KIELBASA AND A COKE, PLEASE

POZNAN, POLAND—As the multiplex boom continues to reverberate across Eastern Europe, United Cinemas International has announced it will invest $100 million to build 10 multiplexes across Poland by 1999, beginning with a high-tech eight-screener in Poznan. It will be the country's first large multiplex (eight screens or more), although the four-screen Kino Femina opened in Warsaw in July 1996 to encouraging boxoffice. The Poznan site will be built on 54,000 square feet and will feature up-to-the-minute sound and visual technology, parking, stadium seating and wheelchair accessibility.

UCI, a joint venture between Universal and Paramount, will collaborate with the Polish media group ITI in the building spree, which UCI Vice President Ray Smith expects will dramatically up admissions in Poland from 24 million in 1995 to 60 million by the year 2000. "Poland is a prime growth market and is still massively underdeveloped," he said, citing the nation's average of one screen per 50,000 people. "With a population of 38 million, the possibilities for UCI in Poland are vast. The experience we gain in Poland will prove invaluable to UCI, as we move into other Eastern European countries over the coming years."

Other sites targeted for cinemas include Warsaw, Gdansk and Krakow. UCI's Polish venture follows the company's announced plans to open 20 sites in Germany over the next 16 months, as well as a total of 35 sites in Brazil and Japan.

Next door in the Czech Republic, the company that built that country's first multiplex announced plans for three more. The Bonton media group's eight-screen Galaxie cinema (See BOXOFFICE story, July 1996) on the outskirts of Prague in spring 1996 is credited with one-third of Prague's current admissions. Bonton is planning a second multiplex in the Czech capital, as well as two regional ones.

WRAP-UP FROM DOWN UNDER by Susan Lambert

GOLD COAST—The 1997 Australian Movie Convention, which ran August 12-16, was by all accounts considered a great success. Organized by the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Queensland (MPEAQ), this year's AMC saw a record number of attendees—800—and trade booths—85—making it the largest industry gathering in Australia. Highlights of the convention included screenings of 20th Century Fox International's "The Full Monty" and United International Pictures' (UIP) presentation of "The Peacemaker," the Hoyts-sponsored awards night, Columbia/TriStar International's "My Best Friend's Wedding" wedding-style luncheon reception, and the final evening's party, "Night at the Big Top," sponsored by Coca-Cola.

Eight films screened over the course of the convention, including a still-being-completed "The Borrowers" (Polygram Filmed Entertainment International), "Mimic" (REP Distribution), "Ulee's Gold" (New Vision), Columbia/TriStar's "My Best Friend's Wedding," Roadshow Films' "Air Force One" and Dendy Films' "Doing Time for Patsy Cline." Fox screened an eight-minute trailer for "Titanic" that left many exhibitors excited about the upcoming film. The buzz also seemed good for an extended sequence from UIP's next James Bond film, "Tomorrow Never Dies."

"WEDDING" PARTY: Directors P.J. Hogan ("My Best Friend's Wedding") and Jocelyn Moorhouse ("A Thousand Acres") at Columbia/TriStar's lunch reception.

At the awards night, Ronin Films' "Shine" took home the Australian Film of the Year Award and the movie's star, Geoffrey Rush, was named Australian Star of the Year. Australian Boxoffice Achievement Awards were handed out for films that broke the AUS$10 million (US$7.5 million) mark. Fox's "Independence Day," which took in almost AUS$30 million ($22.2 million), also won the gold award for highest-grossing film. In accepting the honor, Fox International president Jim Gianopolus promised that, if "The Full Monty" crossed the AUS$10 million mark by next year's show, he'd accept the award while performing the "full monty."

Boxoffice Achievement Awards also went to UIP for "The Nutty Professor," "The First Wives Club," "Liar Liar" and "The Lost World: Jurassic Park"; Buena Vista International (BVI) for "The Rock," "Ransom" and "101 Dalmatians"; Roadshow for Miramax's "The English Patient"; Polygram for "Bean"; Warner Bros. International for "Space Jam" and "Batman and Robin"; and Columbia/TriStar for "Jerry Maguire."

Kodak won the National Film and Sound Archive's Ken G. Hall Award for its contribution to the preservation of Australian film.

Greater Union's theatre at Canberra captured first place in the marketing awards for its promotion of Roadshow's "The Castle." Second place also went to a Greater Union theatre, this at Brisbane, for its "Paradise Road" campaign. And third place went to Valhalla Theatre in Sydney for "Rats in the Ranks."

The show's main seminar—"Is Hollywood Paying Lip Service to International Distribution?"—prompted lively discussion among the keynote speakers, who included Anthony Marcoly, BVI's vice president of distribution; Scott Neeson, Fox executive vice president of international marketing; and Polygram president Stewart Till.

The London-based Till said the major studios remain preoccupied with the domestic market. "Their brains say, 'Look international,'" Till said, "but their heads and 70 years of experience say, 'Just worry about the U.S. and let the rest of the world worry about itself.'" Fox's Neeson, in stressing how important international boxoffice is to the bottom line in Hollywood, said, "International is helping to pay the bills. For that, Hollywood will always pay attention."

Exhibitors expressed complaints about American films being first released in the United States and the lack of subsequent star support for overseas releases. But Neeson said he believes there is a valuable "downflow" of international publicity based on the domestic openings, and BVI's Marcoly noted it was often difficult to persuade major stars to support offshore releases because of their hectic and changing schedules. Marcoly also said that BVI sees "great potential for local co-productions." As evidence, he mentioned the company's first German co-production, "Knockin' on Heaven's Door," and "Ashes From Paradise," an Argentinean co-production. Polygram's Till warned that it was bad business to see the American trend of wider releases and skyrocketing marketing costs being played out on an international front. "If we cut costs by 50 percent," Till said, "that doesn't mean fewer customers would come to the cinemas. But it would certainly improve profitability."

Another forum—entitled "Are Australian Films Becoming More Commercial?"—discussed the growing commercial potential and history of the Australian film industry. Panelist Kim Williams, chief executive of Fox Studios Australia, called the current expanding production market "the most exciting commercial period of Australian cinema." Well-known Australian film critic Peter Thompson moderated the event, which also included P.J. Hogan, Aussie director of "My Best Friend's Wedding"; Tim White, chief executive of Sydney-based Fox/Icon Productions; Chris Kennedy, director of "Doing Time for Patsy Cline"; and Andrew Mackie, director and head of marketing for the Globe Film Co. Hogan and Fox/Icon's White discussed the release of Hogan's "Muriel's Wedding" on the heels of fellow Aussie Stephan Elliott's "The Adventures of Priscilla: Queen of the Desert," a double success that indicated Down Under audiences would be willing and able to support more than one Australian film at a time. Said White, "This is an industry that does have a commercial history and does have a long-established relationship—in that special way—between filmmaker and audience."

Fox Australia's Williams noted that the industry was beginning to develop a body of performers who have real star positioning offering "the kinds of promotional possibilities that are sorely needed for the industry." He mentioned Miranda Otto, Cate Blanchard, Russell Crowe, Geoffrey Rush and Toni Collette as the type of rising stars who give exhibitors of Australian films prominent selling points. Williams added that the industry was starting to see international companies (like Fox Studios) moving into the Australian marketplace that are dedicated to "developing a body of original Australian work for production in Australia intended for international audiences."

At the Thursday "independent" day, specialized film distributors announced the formation of the Australian Independent Distributors Association (AIDA). Richard Becker, managing director of the Becker Group, which owns REP and recently bought Dendy's arthouse distribution and theatre circuit, said the independent distributors had joined forces in order to have a stronger voice in the industry. By the end of the convention, 15 companies had joined the new trade group, including REP, Dendy, New Vision, Potential Films, Ronin, the Australian Film Institute, Reid and Puskar, Sharmill, Globe, Total Film and Television, the Other Film Co. and Palace Films. Some of the issues the association hopes to address will concern censorship, rental terms and classification fees. In January 1996, the Office of Film and Literature Classification upped the per-film fee to AUS$500 (US$373) from AUS$245 (US$182), and insiders say the fee will rise again near the end of 1997 due to a government edict that says the office must fully recover its costs by year-end 1999. Independent distributors claim that another hike will keep many smaller films from being distributed in Australia. Before the AMC began, some independent exhibitors and distributors questioned the convention's ability to accommodate the independents, but by the end of the convention—which included the independents' half-day—many of those distributor indies appeared to be won over. In fact, the only complaints regarding this year's convention concerned what many saw as limited time for the trade show. MPEAQ head Richard Parton noted that the trade show was open an amount of time that equaled last year's (under six hours), but he acknowledged that the growth in the number of booths made it difficult for delegates to see everything. "I suppose it's the price you pay for getting bigger," he said. "It's difficult. But we try to accommodate everybody." Parton added, "We're aware of [the problem] and we'll address it, and I'm sure we'll come up with the answers."

Parton felt this year's convention was "terrific," noting that the distributors had been especially cooperative. "UIP made the effort to get 'The Peacemaker,' which hadn't been shown even to the American critics," Parton said. "And the effort that Polygram made to get a print of 'The Borrowers' is providing us the type of film that people like to see [at the convention]. They want to see a film that's two or three months away, rather than one that's one or two weeks away."

Parton also said the media response made this year's convention really stand out. "We proved we can launch the media coverage of a film from here as Columbia did with 'My Best Friend's Wedding.' I think we've gotten to the stage where we can get those people—the executives as well as our own Australian directors—here to support their films and give them the media release [they deserve]."

And it wasn't only film product being successfully showcased at the AMC. Said Jim Murray, international business development manager of Digital Theater Systems, "There is no other conference quite like the MPEAQ's Australian Movie Convention. I find it valuable, not only in developing the local markets but also in the international markets." Murray noted that business was brisk at the trade show. "DTS has received substantial orders," Murray said, "and we are working toward Australian films being produced in the DTS format." Murray added that, given the excitement and growth in the Australian industry, "next year's convention can only be bigger and better."

The Big Picture

It's tempting to view the current boom in the production of science fiction films as almost wholly driven by baby boom nostalgia for old movie formats, coupled with the impact of computer technology on movie imagery. By coincidence, this very issue of BOXOFFICE reflects that duality. On page 18, we report on "Starship Troopers," a film about a futuristic war between human space soldiers and a vast army of insect-like aliens that would have been impossible to mount believably without the ever-evolving pictorial capabilities of Computer Graphics Imaging (CGI). On page 70, meanwhile, you'll find an article by the legendary Sam Arkoff, founder with the late Jim Nicholson of American International Pictures, whose low-budget science fiction films of the '50s and '60s are demonstrable influences on everything from "Independence Day" to "Event Horizon" to "Men In Black."

In a sense, though, it's still surprising that we're coming to the close of a moviegoing year in which a cheeky sci-fi throwback will almost surely be the top-grossing film. Pundits with a sociological bent have long contended that the science fiction cycle of the '50s was driven by subterranean currents in the post-WWII American psyche—the A-bomb made manifest as the giant radioactive critters of "Them," "The Deadly Mantis" and "The Amazing Colossal Man;" fear of a Russian invasion transmuted into the alien attacks of "Earth vs. The Flying Saucers," "Invaders From Mars" or "War of the Worlds."

Though limiting, such observations are valid enough. Which raises an interesting question: In an era when America is the world's sole superpower, when fears of nuclear attack are stifled by the lack of a worthy global adversary, why are millions of moviegoers being drawn to films which are ultimately trading on genre formulas created and popularized in response to the peculiar social predicament of the Cold War?

Spectacle surely plays a part in our new sci-fi boom; the CGI technologies driving these films are nothing if not capable of spectacular effects. Some believe millennial anxiety is another influence on our contemporary angst about the world of the future, and perhaps there's truth in that as well. The year 2000 does, after all, have a terrifyingly round, anything-can-happen sort of gravitas about it. During the first millennium of the Roman calendar, it has been said, so many of Europe's farmers and laborers became convinced a Biblical apocalypse was just around the corner that there was a marked negative effect on Europe's economy as workers didn't bother with planting crops or shoeing horses that they wouldn't need anyhow come the end of the world. Still, it's hard to believe all that many people of today (other than conspiracy buffs and the religiously obsessed) are currently thinking too hard about numerological symbolism as they go about their daily lives.

The answer to the riddle posed by our revived interest in sci-fi may lie somewhat closer to the eternal verities of the science fiction form, as opposed to the metaphoric filigree the Cold War era hung on it. The great theme of science fiction is, after all, man and his relationship to technology—to the things we create that may ultimately prove too powerful for us to control. In that sense, the myth of Icarus, whose wings melted because he flew too close to the sun, is a work of science fiction—despite the fact that it dates from a time when the nearest thing to a Cold War was between Athens and Sparta. Mary Shelley's "Frankenstein" is surely science fiction—arguably the "Ur" myth underlying the entire genre. Yet "Frankenstein" was written in 1818—a century and more before Yalta, Potsdam, Sputnik and the Berlin Wall.

What usually gets forgotten about '50s America is that there was a lot more than just geopolitical tension going on. Across all sectors of society, a transforming technological paradigm shift was under way, with the TV, the satellite, the rocket booster, the guided missile, the freeway, the commercial jet plane and a thousand other "space age" wonders staggering to life simultaneously. Any one of these creations would have had a major effect on the citizenry. In combination, their impact was almost immeasurable.

For with new convenience came massive social dislocation. The superhighway allowed city dwellers to move to the suburbs, where the solitude of a 40 minute commute, plus isolation from the easy interaction of the urban neighborhood enclaves that had nurtured generations, were the price of increased security and material comfort. The hydrogen bomb and the guided missile made Americans feel safe from any enemy—until the enemy got them too, and there was suddenly nowhere on the entire planet to hide. TV entertained cheaply, but it also cut deeply into hours traditionally spent on "quality time" among family members. By the mid-'50s, the dysfunctional family was edging toward becoming an American norm, juvenile delinquency was a growing social problem, and divorce rates were starting to climb.

More than Stalin, the bomb, and the horrors of creeping, TV broadcast-induced American conformity, technology itself can therefore be said to have haunted the sci-fi screens of the '50s, just as it more subtly haunts our own sci-fi renaissance today. For once again, we live in a time of rapid technological change, as "www" prefixes and ".com" suffixes and the Microsoft Corporation intrude further each day into those subliminal spaces in our collective unconscious where we try to define ourselves and our place in the world. That enticing, fetishized monstrosity, the personal computer, and its endlessly replicating offshoot, the World Wide Web, give us ever more intricate excuses to boot up, jack in, and cut ourselves off from simpler forms of human contact like speech and touch—simpler forms which are the very things the psychologists and sociologists say we already lack most in our overly compartmentalized world, and which we need now more than ever before.

Think of it: the personal computer has become almost as common as the television, the radio, the VCR. Statistics show that high school students have suddenly found a new interest in math—not out of a love for the complex wonders of Euclid and the square root of pi but because they fear for their professional futures if the PC revolution, with its emphasis on hard data, should leave them behind. Simulated realities—a sci-fi pipedream as recently as three years ago—are becoming as commonplace as the closest theatre lobby, the latest press release from GameWorks or DisneyQuest. And so the struggle of the Men In Black, the futuristic Starship Trooper, may in fact be as much a metaphoric struggle to humanize unfathomable technologies through pluck or humor as it is a struggle against weird extraterrestrial forces. The alien beings who gather in the dark spaces outside the framelines of our movie screens waiting to rush in and destroy us or bend us to their will may at least in part be emissaries of the unknowable, potentially dehumanizing effects of an enemy whose language and customs are rooted not in Latin, Greek and Old Middle English but in Fortran, Basic and DOS.

That the computers themselves are largely the technological authors of the images that speak to our unease about them is an irony of potentially historic proportions. Or maybe not an irony, but a throughline from the Cold War genre formulas which live again in our moviehouses. For one distinctive aspect of the science fiction movies that '50s and '60s filmmakers like Jack Arnold, Roger Corman, Sam Arkoff and a hundred journeyman screenwriters and directors bequeathed to us was a relentless sense of paranoia about what's going on just outside of our field of vision, and the scale of the enemy's victory. The invaders are here, their movies so often seem to say, but they have come to us unannounced; the battle may be already lost before we realize it has even begun. Our foe hasn't shown his face yet, or else he looks like something familiar, even desirable. We may meet the enemy, only to find that he is us.

Hail and Farewell...

In order to be a writer, you have to believe in symmetry. Not necessarily that the world functions according to some grand organizing principle; there are as many fine writers whose work seeks to disprove that concept as there are those who choose to support it. But to write almost anything, you have to believe that conclusions can be drawn from the grand human chaos of living, that decipherable meanings are out there, waiting to be unearthed, and that things of both shadow and substance can be set down and communicated to others in some combination of hieroglyphs and type. The very act of setting pen to paper is, in its own way, ultimately an act of faith.

Here at BOXOFFICE, we have arrived at a moment of carefully scripted symmetry—a moment involving not just the people who work here, but every one of you who read the information, opinions and verbal daydreams we provide. This issue marks the end of our 1997 production calendar, but it is also a bittersweet ending of another sort: my final issue as BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE's Editor-in-Chief.

Conflicted as my own emotions are about leaving this wonderful organization and the even more wonderful people with whom I've shared the greatest creative adventure of my life so far, it has been dawning on me for some time that other endeavors might be calling to me. It may have occurred to those of you who have lived through my four years as Editor-in-Chief that this magazine was in the hands of a fairly restless soul. My time at the helm has been one of incremental but quite dramatic change in the look, layout, format and content of this publication—changes that were not the work of a single individual, but of an entire staff that was willing to give its all to make BOXOFFICE what, for good or ill, was my view of the very best it could be.

My vision of BOXOFFICE reached fruition about 18 months ago, when, thanks to the heroic efforts of Managing Editor Kim Williamson and Senior Editor Christine James, BOXOFFICE began what for me was an unprecedented and still uninterrupted run of great issues—issues against which even an inveterate nitpicker like Ray Greene found it hard to lodge a single complaint. Once upon a time, I had a vision of where I'd like to see BOXOFFICE go to. Beginning last year, we arrived at my version of that destination, and so my primary efforts since then have been directed more at consolidating that achievement than at finding new aesthetic mountains to climb.

I understand enough about the very talented people I work with to know that their personal inclinations might easily have steered them toward destinations that are different and perhaps even superior to the one I chose to go to. Running BOXOFFICE has been an amazing learning experience for me on almost every front, and one of the things I've learned about myself is that consolidating gains—which is a necessary aspect of any executive position—does not seem to hold my interest in the very long run. I would appear to be less fascinated by the view from my idea of the summit than I was by the original climb.

Put those two perceptions together and another perception slowly becomes born: that my creative energies, which have been so bound up in BOXOFFICE all these years, have come to a moment of transition, and that the most intriguing and inventive possibility left to me might be to know when to stand aside.

There could be no better hands to pass BOXOFFICE into than those of Kim and Christine, who came to us as excellent journalists, and then blossomed before my eyes into two of the finest writers and editors I have ever had the honor to know. I've worked hard during my time at BOXOFFICE, but that said, it's easy to overvalue the contributions of the man who comes first on the masthead. While I'm proud of so many of the things it was granted to me to do here, hiring Kim and Christine onto the BOXOFFICE staff was to me the most significant contribution I made during my BOXOFFICE career.

Two other members of our full-time staff were co-workers I inherited from my predecessor: our National Advertising Director, Bob Vale, and his assistant, Linda Andrade. The Linda I will always remember was not only an amazingly competent worker able to solve a million crises with style, humor and aplomb, but a sort of unofficial muse to the rest of us—a source of constant encouragement and inspiration, a collaborator, a co-conspirator, a comrade in arms.

Bob Vale, on the other hand, is the other half of the most sustained professional collaboration I have ever enjoyed—my mentor, when necessary; my adversary, where appropriate; and, underlying everything else, my dear and very close friend. Of the million precious memories I will take away with me, it occurs to me as I write this that the sound of Bob's booming laughter as he joked and jibed his way through a thousand thousand sales calls may be the most precious one of all.

Four more people helped make my time at BOXOFFICE memorable: Morrie Schlozman, our gentlemanly and still-vital connection to this magazine's glorious past; Gwen Campbell, ad consultant extraordinaire; Dan Johnson, that pleasant, laughing voice on the phone, holding the fort at our home office. And no farewell would be complete without acknowledging the enormous support of our publisher Bob Dietmeier, who was unstinting in his acknowledgement of the things that went right, and unwavering in his willingness to let us attempt things a less generous publisher might have balked at. The security of his commitment to this magazine and those who work for it was the connective thread of my time in the Big Chair. For that, Mr. D., and for your faith in me, you will always have my deepest thanks.

My byline will continue to appear in BOXOFFICE from time to time, but an era, such as it was, has herewith come to a close. And so I take my seat in the bleachers with the rest of you, rejoining you on the other side of that mysterious frontier that separates the reader from the read. December is upon us. A moment of closure, but also of new possibilities. And while I may be personally moving toward other journeys, and am excited by all the prospects that movement represents, I leave BOXOFFICE with a heart almost too full for expression: I go forward, but with a fond, amazed, and permanent backward glance.

It has been a privilege serving all of you,

Ray Greene

JBL Cinema Sound. The Sound of Yesteryear, Next Year and Every Year in Between.

Starting back in 1936, when James B. Lansing won an Academy Award for Technical Excellence, JBL has earned a legendary reputation for quality, reliability and innovation. Today, more than three-quarters of all cinema loudspeakers sold worldwide come from JBL. No other manufacturer offers as wide a range of solutions for the demands of modern cinema. That's why, from the smallest rooms to the largest, most exotic installations in the world, JBL remains... the speaker of the house.

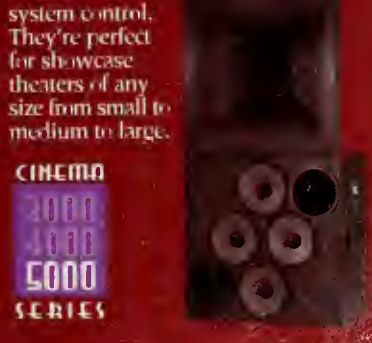
The Samuel Goldwyn Theatre at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences.

From stand-alones to megaplexes, always the perfect fit.

Cinema 3000 Series:

This series is designed to provide the maximum value for the minimum cost. The 3000 Series has a shallow profile cabinet and the most economical subwoofer available, making it the perfect choice where space and budgets are limited. THX Approved.

Cinema 4000 Series:



This is the industry standard for a wide variety of room sizes. These are the systems that launched the modern era of cinema sound and the ones now used in most dubbing rooms throughout the world. THX Approved.

Cinema 5000 Series:

The 5000 Series represents JBL's best cinema systems, and features the most advanced loudspeaker technology for today's soundtrack requirements. This series includes new three-way systems which maximize digital sound sources, plus digital signal control for an easier set-up and more precise overall sound system control. They're perfect for showcase theaters of any size from small to medium to large.

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Jodie Foster's Egg Pictures has announced a slate of 14 pictures in various stages of development. Currently in production is "The Baby Dance," based on a play by Jane Anderson about an infertile couple who consider buying a baby from a poor family. Anderson is writing the screenplay and directing; the film will star Stockard Channing, Laura Dern and Peter Reigert. Also in the works at Egg is the Richard Loncraine-helmed "Jonathan Wild," a crime drama set in the 17th century that's being scripted by Don Macpherson ("The Avengers"); "Waking the Dead," a romantic drama starring Billy Crudup ("Without Limits"); "Keely and Du," based on a play by Jane Martin with the adaptation being written by Emmy-winning writer Theresa Rebeck (TV's "NYPD Blue") for director Betty Thomas ("Private Parts"); and the Al Pacino starrer "Investigation," which is based on a Paul Schrader screenplay that's an adaptation of the 1970 Oscar-winning foreign language film "Investigation of a Citizen Above Suspicion." To date, Egg has produced two films: 1994's "Nell," in which Foster starred, and 1995's "Home for the Holidays," which she directed. Egg has a production deal with Polygram Filmed Entertainment; most of Egg's films will be distributed either through Gramercy or Polygram Films, the company's newly established wide-release distribution entity.

Writer/director George Tillman and producer Bob Teitel have entered a two-year, first-look production deal with Fox 2000, which released the duo's current hit "Soul Food," the comedy/drama that cooked up surprisingly hot boxoffice receipts of $11 million on its opening weekend. Tillman and Teitel will have an office on the Fox lot and will be developing projects for Tillman to write and helm and Teitel to produce. They may also become involved in producing other people's films.

"Scream" scribe Kevin Williamson has expanded his previously announced pact with Miramax/Dimension to a multi-million-dollar film and television production deal that extends into the next century. The first project under the arrangement will be "Killing Mrs. Tingle," about a girl who will do anything to be valedictorian of her class. Williamson wrote the script and will make his directorial debut on the comedic horror/thriller. Williamson's most recent scripting credit is the Columbia thriller "I Know What You Did Last Summer," and his much-anticipated follow-up to "Scream," whose title will be either "Scream 2" or "Scream Again," is due in theatres this month.

In a related item, Miramax recently announced that a staggering marketing budget of $15-20 million has been allotted to promote the sequel to last year's surprise blockbuster, which grossed $103 million domestically. That figure is more than double the amount spent to promote the original. Talks are underway with several fast-food chains, with Taco Bell emerging at press time as the most likely promotional partner.

"Scream 2" stars some of today's hippest talent, including Neve Campbell, Courteney Cox, David Arquette, Liev Schreiber, Sarah Michelle Gellar and Jerry O'Connell. The biggest mystery isn't who's the killer, but which of these hot young stars' characters will survive to headline "Scream 3," which Williamson is currently writing.

John Cusack, currently starring in Warner Bros.' "Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil," has signed a first-look deal with Castle Rock Entertainment to write, produce and star in films. The recent Buena Vista hit "Grosse Pointe Blank," which starred and was scripted by Cusack, was the first film from New Crime Productions, which Cusack runs with Steven Pink and D.V. DeVincentis. (The partners in Crime are currently working with Caravan on a sequel to "Grosse Pointe Blank," the black comedy about a hit man who questions his career choice and decides to attend his high school reunion to get a perspective on life. Cusack's character, Martin Q. Blank, may choose a job as a corporate downsizer—eliminating people the non-prosecutable way—in the follow-up film). New Crime's new deal with Castle Rock reunites Cusack with Castle Rock topper Rob Reiner, the director who gave Cusack his first starring role in 1985's "The Sure Thing."

Jane Campion, who won an Oscar for scripting "The Piano" (which she also directed), has inked a three-year, first-look pact with Polygram-based Propaganda Films. She'll write and produce projects for Propaganda through her production company, Big Shell Films, and one of her two next directorial efforts will be for Propaganda as well. Campion last helmed Gramercy's Nicole Kidman starrer "The Portrait of a Lady." Propaganda's recent features include Polygram's "The Game" and Buena Vista's "A Thousand Acres."

London-based Heyday Films has signed scripter Darren Bailie to a three-picture deal for Warner Bros. Heyday head David Heyman, a former production executive at Warner, has a first-look deal with his former employer, under which Heyman is charged with seeking emerging British talent for the studio. The deal with Bailie is the first under the pact; acquired was the as-yet-unproduced scribe's spy thriller set in London, as well as the rights to two other screenplays.

Mark Waters, writer/director of Miramax's black comedy "The House of Yes," has entered into a first-look deal with the studio. "Miramax has been extremely supportive with 'The House of Yes,' and I look forward to working on my next project with them," says Waters. That project will be "Strike," a modern-day version of Aristophanes' comedic anti-war themed play "Lysistrata" set in a small-town high school.

"Bad" Girl

MATTHEW BRODERICK

Wins "Election"

BABE

Bright Lights, Big Piggy

"THE RUNAWAY JURY" This adaptation by Gregory Poirier ("Rosewood") of John Grisham's novel, to be directed by Joel Schumacher ("A Time To Kill"), will star Ed Norton ("The People Vs. Larry Flynt") as a man who manipulates his fellow jurors to vote his way on a precedent-setting tobacco liability ruling. Gwyneth Paltrow ("Great Expectations") also stars. (Warner)

"PLUNKETT & MACLEANE" Jonny Lee Miller ("Trainspotting") and Robert Carlyle ("The Full Monty") star as highwaymen with hearts of gold in this comedy set in the 1700s. Liv Tyler ("That Thing You Do!") co-stars. Jake Scott, son of Ridley Scott, makes his directorial debut. (Distribution is to be set)

"THE OTHER SISTER" Diane Keaton ("The First Wives Club") will star in this drama as the mother of a mildly mentally-retarded teenaged daughter who falls in love with a similarly handicapped classmate. Garry Marshall (helmer of "Frankie and Johnny") directs, co-scripts and produces. (Buena Vista)

"I WOKE UP EARLY THE DAY I DIED" This film, based on a long-lost script by Ed Wood of "Plan 9 From Outer Space" fame, will star an eclectic ensemble cast including Billy Zane ("The Phantom"), Christina Ricci ("The Ice Storm"), Rosanna Arquette ("Deceiver"), Amanda Plummer ("Pulp Fiction"), Eartha Kitt ("Ernest Scared Stupid"), John Ritter ("Sling Blade") and Sandra Bernhard ("Unzipped"). (Distribution is to be set)

"IN DREAMS" Robert Downey Jr. will play a serial killer who kidnaps the daughter of a psychic woman. The mother then begins having dreams about the killer and must prove her visions are true if she is to save her child. Aidan Quinn and Annette Bening also star. (DreamWorks)

"EUGENE ONEGIN" Ralph Fiennes will star and his sister Martha will make her directorial debut in this adaptation of the classic Russian verse novel of the same name. Liv Tyler ("Inventing the Abbotts") also stars. (Distribution is to be set)

"VERY BAD THINGS" Christian Slater ("Julian Po") will play a groom whose life takes a drastic turn the day before his wedding, when bachelor party brouhaha results in the accidental death of a prostitute. Cameron Diaz ("My Best Friend's Wedding") plays the bride-to-be. In talks to join the cast are Jeanne Tripplehorn ("'Til There Was You"), Robert Patrick ("Terminator 2"), Jeremy Piven ("Grosse Pointe Blank") and Jon Favreau ("Swingers"). Peter Berg, a star of TV's "Chicago Hope," scripts and makes his directing debut. (Distribution is to be set)

"ONE TRUE THING" Renee Zellweger ("Jerry Maguire") and Meryl Streep ("Marvin's Room") will star in this story, based on Anna Quindlen's novel, of an on-the-rise journalist (Zellweger) who comes home to help her father care for her terminally ill mother (Streep). The daughter is later accused of giving her mother a lethal dose of morphine. (Universal)

"RONIN" A Ronin is a Japanese term for a master samurai. In this action drama, a group of former intelligence agents of different nationalities are recruited to carry out a dangerous mission. Robert De Niro ("CopLand") is in talks to star for director John Frankenheimer ("The Manchurian Candidate"). (UA)

"MADELEINE" Ludwig Bemelman's classic children's books about the adventures of a Parisian schoolgirl will be brought to the bigscreen by helmer Daisy von Scherler Mayer ("Party Girl"). Frances McDormand ("Fargo") will play the headmistress of Madeleine's school. Nigel Hawthorne ("The Madness of King George") is in talks to play Lord Covington. (TriStar)

"BROKEDOWN PALACE" Jonathan Kaplan ("Bad Girls") will direct this drama about two teenage girls ("The Rainmaker's" Claire Danes and "Cold Comfort Farm's" Kate Beckinsale) who take a trip to Thailand and are wrongfully sentenced to 33 years in prison for smuggling. (Fox)

"AMERICAN NEUROTIC" Hugh Grant ("Nine Months") plays a man who seeks the help of a psychiatrist to cure him of his inability to commit to one woman. When he finally meets the monogamy-inspiring woman of his dreams, he discovers with dismay she's his psychiatrist's daughter. (Columbia)

"ELECTION" This dark high school comedy will star Matthew Broderick ("Addicted to Love") as a teacher who hates the overachieving top candidate for school president ("Freeway's" Reese Witherspoon) and grooms another student to run against her. Alexander Payne ("Citizen Ruth") directs. (Paramount)

"THE INTERPRETER" Robin Williams and helmer Chris Columbus, who worked together on the 1993 hit "Mrs. Doubtfire," will reteam in this comedy in which Williams will play an underqualified interpreter who inadvertently incites mayhem by mistranslating international negotiations of global importance. (Fox)

"BOMBSHELL" Leonardo DiCaprio ("Titanic") is set to play Theodore Hall in this adaptation of Joseph Albright and Marcia Kunstel's book, which chronicles the events leading up to the Cold War. Hall was the genius teen biophysicist who was the youngest member of the team that developed the atomic bomb. He passed on highly classified information to the Soviet Union, purportedly because he felt the balance of power would decrease the likeliness of the weapon being used. (Distribution is to be set)

"MATRIX" Keanu Reeves ("Chain Reaction") and Lawrence Fishburne ("Event Horizon") will star in this thriller about a society enslaved by an alien race of computers that use humans as an energy source. An underground group of hackers strive to combat technology. Andy and Larry Wachowski ("Bound") will direct. (Warner)

"BABE IN METROPOLIS" James Cromwell ("Star Trek: First Contact") will reprise his Oscar-nominated role as Farmer Hoggett in this sequel, in which everyone's favorite pig tries to save the farm from foreclosure by travelling to the States to vie for the cash prize in an American sheepherding competition. George Miller returns to helm. (Universal)

ET CETERA: Patricia Arquette will be the point in a love triangle in the Woody Harrelson and Billy Crudup starrer "HiLo Country"...Danny DeVito is in talks to direct and star in Universal's action/comedy "Mystery Men," about a group of second-rate superheroes with not-so-amazing powers...In the Fox comedy "High Boys and Low Boys," Chris Rock plays a street-smart guy on the run from the mob. He tries to hide out by getting a job with an antique dealer (Rupert Everett) but he finds that the curio world is even more crooked than the mob.

FAT CITY

Asian Film's Reigning Top Gun CHOW YUN-FAT Blasts His Way into Hollywood With His English-Language "REPLACEMENT KILLERS"

by Shlomo Schwartzberg

He may be one of the biggest stars in the world, but Asian movie icon Chow Yun-Fat has yet to crack the lucrative North American market. That's set to change as he prepares for the imminent release of his first American action film, "The Replacement Killers," in which he stars as a conflicted hit man opposite Chinese-speaking American actress Mira Sorvino.

Upon first meeting the handsome 42-year-old, one can't help but be struck by his movie star glamour. Wearing a white linen jacket, black pants and a silk tie, the urbane, polite and soft-spoken Chow prompts comparison to the cinematic royalty of olden days; the Cary Grant references that Chow's role in the John Woo-directed "Once A Thief" evoked seem fully justified up close. And judging by the reaction of the crowds in the theatre where he appeared at The Toronto International Film Festival, Chow certainly has a star's gift of exciting people merely by his presence—although such reactions still surprise him in a hemisphere where he feels he doesn't really have that much audience cachet.

"I'm glad that they give me a lot of support. I never think about the North American [public], but the people who have seen me in John [Woo's] films, they give me a lot of respect. I'm stunned when I walk into the theatre."

Chow Yun-Fat showed up in Toronto to present a retrospective showing of one of his favorite films—the formative one, in fact, that inspired him to go him into acting. Thanks to his Woo collaborations—which include "The Killer," "A Better Tomorrow" and "Hard-Boiled," the three Hong Kong productions that made Woo's name in America—Chow is thought of in the West as mainly an action star. But if "One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest" isn't a title you'd expect Chow to choose as one of his all-time favorites, you probably don't know the man and his background all that well.

"Actually," says Chow, "my career started in 1974. I started out by working for TV stations for 14 years, a long contract." As a television actor, he played doctor/lawyer/dramatic roles, mostly in Hong Kong soap operas, on which he never picked up a gun. "I never, never did action-hero types, like in 'A Better Tomorrow' or 'The Killer,' until in 1986 when I met John Woo and made 'A Better Tomorrow, Part One.' But the filmmakers who saw me first as a Hong Kong film idol holding two guns, they think of me as the action hero." Will he continue to be pegged solely as an action star? "It depends on the [performance of] my first American movie," he says. "If the movie sales come out good, then maybe I can do some comedy or drama." To prepare for that possibility, Chow numbers intense actors like Robert De Niro, Jack Nicholson, Marlon Brando and Nicholas Cage among the performers with whom he'd like to co-star.

> "In Hollywood, a lot of the audience and script-writers will stick to very physical or very logical ideas—they say, 'you cannot do that.'"

The idea of working in Hollywood isn't as alien for Chow as one might think. "When I was a teenager [in Hong Kong] I saw a lot of Hollywood movies like 'The Longest Day,' 'The Great Escape.' Mostly, I liked the war movies." Hong Kong barely had a movie industry then, a state of affairs that lasted until the 1970s, with the arrival of Bruce Lee and his Kung Fu movies. "After Bruce Lee, the whole market changed," Chow says.

The Lee connection is an interesting one, since Lee was arguably the first Asian superstar to attract an American audience. Now Chow stands poised for his own pass at American stardom, and he recognizes just how much is riding on his first American film. Though it features some strong action elements, "The Replacement Killers" promises to offer Chow a chance to display some of his considerable acting range: As a hit man who refuses to carry out a contract killing on a young child and ends up being hunted himself, Chow will get the chance to play the kind of complex "good bad man" that made his Hong Kong films for Woo such an international sensation.

"The Replacement Killers" is, Chow admits, "absolutely" a test case for his chances of making it in the U.S. and Hollywood. And he's very aware that his success or failure in the U.S. will impact other Asian actors who want to break into the American film industry. "I feel a little bit of pressure," he says. "I'm glad I'm the first one to take the bullet."

But he also knows he can't really predict how "The Replacement Killers" will do at the U.S. boxoffice, something he could do in Hong Kong, where his name on the marquee pretty much guarantees a hit, as it does in all other Asian territories. "I do my best," he says. "My situation as an actor in foreign productions is totally different."

If Chow breaks through in the U.S., he will be following in the footsteps of at least one major Hong Kong film personality: his old friend Woo, a director who is among the hottest in Hollywood on the strength of last summer's blockbuster hit "Face/Off" and its predecessor "Broken Arrow." Given how close the two men are, it seems natural to wonder why Chow wasn't featured in those earlier Woo hits. According to Chow, Woo would have been taking needless risks by using an actor like Chow who is little-known in America before Woo himself was fully established in Hollywood. "This is a very sensitive political question. Mostly, I have to thank John Woo. John Woo brought my name to international [attention], so more or less, people who know John Woo know me. There are always some difficulties about the politics of the studios. They won't allow Woo [the freedom to choose his cast on] an $80 million budget. He's just a small kid in this market."

Now that he's made his own American film debut, Chow has noticed other interesting differences between the American production system and that of Hong Kong. "Hollywood is totally different from the Hong Kong style," Chow says. "Our working schedule [on 'The Replacement Killers'] was very systematic, everything fixed, you cannot change a line anytime. In Hong Kong, you shoot 20 hours and 40 hours straight. Here, they make sure it's 12 hours a day. [The Hollywood system] is much better, physically, for actors. In Hong Kong, you can [be shooting] four or five films, all at the same time!"

Budgetwise, the $28 million "Replacement Killers" towers over the average $1.2 million Hong Kong action epic. (Hong Kong budgets can go up to $6 million "if they belong to the Jackie Chan level," adds Chow.)

In general, Hong Kong actors are far more likely to do their own stuntwork than are their American counterparts. Chow did attempt to do most of his own stunts in "The Replacement Killers:" "More than 80 percent of the time, I tried to do it myself." But unions and the film's stunt coordinator often decreed otherwise; Chow estimates that he finally got to do only about half his stunts in the finished film.

He is basically happy with how he comes across in "The Replacement Killers," "except my English. At the very beginning, I was so afraid of the pronunciation, so I took great care." For Chow, the trade-off was that concentrating on the mechanics of the English language occasionally deflected him in his search for his character's "anguish" over his plight in the film. Co-star Sorvino (who has a degree in Chinese culture) helped a lot, especially as she and Chow could speak Mandarin to each other. "I'm glad that I had the privilege to work with her for my first American movie," Chow says, "because she never made me feel nervous at all. We had fun on the set, we talked a lot because sometimes Quentin [Sorvino's boyfriend, Quentin Tarantino, an acknowledged Chow Yun-Fat fan] would come to the set and say hello to everybody."

Chow's new experiences in the American industry do excite him, though he says he could live without the current fixation on a film's first weekend take at the boxoffice. "I think the problem is the [emphasis the] studio will put on the numbers, how much you get back from the market," he says. And while Hollywood may be physically easier for actors, it restricts the kind of films they can star in, feels Chow. "Hong Kong movies are not about reality, we're talking about fantasy. Mostly, in Hollywood, a lot of the audience and scriptwriters will stick to very physical or very logical ideas—they say, 'you cannot do that.' In Hong Kong, we're so free, we can do a drama with action and comedy together, we can do comedy with action and romance together, we can mix it together. But here, action is action, romance is romance. Hong Kong movies try to attract different kinds of audiences, so they put every ingredient in the soup."

Chow chose the part of the hit man in "The Replacement Killers" because it differed from the run-of-the-mill scripts he was being offered by Hollywood. "In the last few years, my [American] agent and my manger tried to set up a lot of different roles for me. But usually a lot of studios sent me the same [type of] scripts, with me as the gangster of Chinatown, the big brother. This is not the way to do it. So fortunately, my producer Max Baer proposed a different kind of script [which became 'The Replacement Killers']. I had to do this character—it seemed like a very good role for my first American movie."

Choosing to work with a first-time director as he did with Antoine Fuqua on "The Replacement Killers" may have seemed risky, but Chow insists his relationship with Fuqua was rewarding. "He's a very nice man, a very talented director. He gave me a lot of freedom to influence my character. And I also got involved in developing the script. I talked a lot to the scriptwriter." Chow took a hands-on approach to fleshing out his character, who was initially more generic. "More or less, I tried to get a sense of this guy, his own [reality as] a killer who is from China. His background, very clearly, is very Chinese, he's a soldier from before his life of crime."

SURE AS SHOOTIN': A Woo-like face-off from "The Replacement Killers."

Unlike most of his Hong Kong roles, in "The Replacement Killers," Chow doesn't get the girl. "It's not a romance, more of a buddy [relationship], no sex scenes, no kissing. It's very clean," says Chow with a laugh.

Depending on the performance of "The Replacement Killers," Chow may next star in a new version of "Anna and the King" (the drama on which Rodgers and Hammerstein's "The King and I" was based) or in a Hollywood movie directed by Woo. The Woo project is being developed under the title "King's Ransom;" Chow describes it as a caper comedy in the vein of Woo's "Once a Thief."

Recent reports of a declining boxoffice for indigenous productions in Hong Kong worry him. "The market is dying because the production is worse, we don't have a top writer, director. We need some new blood, including new stars." The home market matters greatly to Chow because, unlike other Hong Kong luminaries such as Woo and director Tsui Hark ("A Chinese Ghost Story"), both of whom have left the territory, Chow has no intention of emigrating from Hong Kong now that it has returned to Chinese rule. "We still have our freedom of speech, the economy is picking up faster than under the British, and the film market is picking up from this summer. I think [unless] you make a very serious film that goes against the communist party, things will be fine."

SPECIAL "GUEST"

Alan Rickman Invites Audiences into his "Winter" Wonderland

by Christine James

TIME AND TIDE: Emma Thompson stands against a frozen sea in Alan Rickman's directorial debut "The Winter Guest."

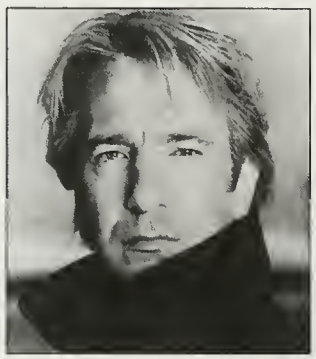
"There's a bug on your hand," BOXOFFICE informs Alan Rickman.

"Oh, I don't mind," he says in a gentle tone, delicately brushing the insect away while making sure not to injure the creature. "Go on, fly away," he tells it tenderly.

It's conclusive proof that the actor who thought nothing of annihilating innumerable humans in such films as "Die Hard" and "Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves" in real life would not hurt a fly.



Of course, while Rickman is best known for his villainous characterizations, he has had equal success in portraying sensitive, sympathetic sorts in films like "Truly, Madly, Deeply" and "Sense and Sensibility." And now, he takes on another persona, this time assuming a role behind the camera. As the director of "The Winter Guest," Rickman tells the tale of four pairs of people and their perspectives on life.

Set in a small Scottish town on the coldest day in history—so cold the sea has frozen over—"The Winter Guest's" central focus is the contentious yet loving relationship between a mother and daughter, played by real-life mother and daughter Phyllida Law and Emma Thompson. Intertwined into their account are the stories of a teenage couple (Gary Hollywood and Arlene Cockburn) falling in love; two 12-year-old boys (Douglas Murphy and Sean Biggerstaff) embarking on adventures; and two 65-year-old women (Sheila Reid and Sandra Voe) whose hobby is attending funerals of people they don't know. "You're there with [these characters] looking at life through generations," Rickman synopsizes. "And if that sounds a little somber, it shouldn't, because I hope that a lot of it is very funny."

The material itself was commissioned by Rickman after many conversations with Lindsay Duncan, one of his co-stars in the Royal Shakespeare Company's production of "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," about her relationship with her mother. Rickman brought some of the ideas that came from these anecdotes to writer Sharman Macdonald, who scripted a stage version, which premiered in England in 1995 and which Rickman directed with Phyllida Law starring.

"When the notion for the piece came," Rickman recalls, "Sharman was the first person I thought of who should write it. I knew that it was her because of the fact that I had read her first play ['When I Was a Girl I Used to Scream and Shout'] when I was on a script panel at one of London's fringe theatres, and I'd recommended that it should be done. So it's sort of a full-circle thing.

"There's quite a lot of full circles in this piece," Rickman muses, "what with Phyllida not being able to do the play until the time when we did it, because she'd been nursing her own mother and she couldn't do any theatre. And then the absolute moment I rang her to ask her if she would read it was when she was available to do theatre again. And then the fact that when the notion of the film came up, it so happened that the circle was turning and it was exactly the right time for Emma. Five years earlier and she would have been too young."

Having a natural mother-daughter rapport already established with Law and Thompson was a boon, says Rickman, while acknowledging that "it might have been a nightmare. I can think of a few mother-daughter relationships that might not have worked at all on film. They might have been horribly competitive, or their real-life relationship might have been incredibly complicated to shake off in order to play a relationship that isn't theirs. As it happened, that wasn't the case. They're very different people, but they're very complementary. And they both have a huge amount of respect for each other as actors. And truth be told, after a while, you forget that they're mother and daughter, because they're two actors, and it would be an insult to treat them in any way other than as two actors. It's only really when you get to the editing room and suddenly in a shot, you get an echo of two profiles, or you see how fluid they are with each other in a scene where they're close, and the body language gives their relationship away. And then you realize how much of a bonus it has been."

> "[Filmmaking is like] an animal with many legs, and you keep finding another pair that you haven't put shoes on."

Reflecting on his feature directing debut, Rickman likens the filmmaking process to "an animal with many legs, and you keep finding another pair that you haven't put shoes on. It's a fantastically rewarding job," he adds, "but of course you're not aware of that at the time. When people say, 'Do you enjoy it?', you kind of look back and think, 'Now, was there a moment where I had time to say, "Am I enjoying this?"'"

What Rickman is currently enjoying is the advance positive buzz from the Venice and Montreal film festivals. "I'm very happy that when people go and see it, it means a lot to them personally," he comments. "When the film ends, the conversation begins with the audience, and that's a new one every night it plays."

Rickman doesn't have any more directorial projects lined up at the moment, but he says he's "sure I will do it again if and when there is a piece of writing that suggests itself. But it will always be based on the quality of the writing. And so now I will act." His next role will be another typecasting-buster: He'll be playing an angel in Kevin Smith's ethereally-tinged comedy "Dogma." "The greatest thing is to be able to do something out of the blue that you couldn't have predicted and is free of any preconceptions. It would be wonderful to think that the future is unknown and sort of surprising."

When asked if he's happy with the evolution of his career, Rickman replies pragmatically, "There's no point in not being, really. Because it's what it is. Chaotic, I suppose. But there's a line in the film when Phyllida says, 'You've got to open up your heart and let chaos in.' So maybe that's a lesson that I've had to learn."

"The Winter Guest." Starring Emma Thompson and Phyllida Law. Directed by Alan Rickman. Written by Sharman Macdonald and Alan Rickman. Produced by Ken Lipper, Edward R. Pressman and Steve Clark-Hall. A Fine Line release. Drama. Opens Dec. 19.

Tom Matthews (center) is flanked by wife Pam and producer Arnold Kopelson on the set of "Mad City."

The web page is up," Tom Matthews remarks, noting one sure sign that "Mad City," the movie for which he wrote the screenplay, is indeed a reality.

Like many a writer who has toiled for years in hopes of seeing his credit up there on the silver screen, Matthews has often been a doubting Thomas. His anxieties were compounded by his first-hand knowledge of just how Hollywood functions. His insight was gleaned from studying movie production at film school and then working as a publicist, a film critic and a film business magazine editor. In fact, Matthews worked at this very publication for six years, rising in the ranks from associate editor to managing editor before leaving BOXOFFICE in 1991 to pursue his screenwriting dreams full-time.

Were Matthews still with BOXOFFICE, he might have been either reviewing the latest Warner Bros. movie or interviewing stars like Dustin Hoffman and John Travolta or director Costa-Gavras. But he escaped the mad city of Los Angeles, so instead he's on the phone from his home in Wauwatosa, in his native Wisconsin, expressing mild surprise that his boyhood dream has actually come true and that those actors and that director are making his movie, about to be released by that studio. Is it like he imagined it would be? Yes. As expected, he's both pleased and disappointed.

He'd only seen the movie 90 percent completed at the time of this interview, but says it was satisfying, if a little surreal, to see "what had only existed in my head" realized on the screen.

"It does follow my script fairly closely," he says, "but there is a lot of dialogue which doesn't make it, stuff I was quite attached to which is not in the film. But the meat of the story is there," he affirms, accepting the inevitability that actors, especially those with the clout and status of Hoffman and Travolta, will put their own spin on the writer's words and that the work of other re-writers has also been factored in (although Matthews does receive sole scripting credit.)

In 1993, in collaboration with his friend Eric Williams (a former BOXOFFICE contributor), Matthews conceived of the idea for "Mad City's" story, which involves a character-driven conflict that also takes on the issue of media responsibility. Utilized as inspiration were previous films on similar themes like Frank Capra's "Meet John Doe," Billy Wilder's "The Big Carnival," and Sidney Lumet's "Dog Day Afternoon" and "Network."

Because "Mad City's" main characters—a TV journalist (Hoffman) and a small town museum security guard (Travolta) who are both desperate to make up for life failures—are not essentially sympathetic, and there's no conventional happy ending, Matthews was pessimistic about the script's chances of getting made. He and his wife Pam had just decided to give up of the tensions of California living and relocate with their two young sons, Kevin and Paul, to Matthews' Wisconsin homeland when mere days later, the script sold for what the trade papers termed "a low six-figure sum." The deal was at Universal, but as is normal in Hollywood, nothing much happened after the initial enthusiasm, and the rights lapsed after 18 months. Subsequently, the rights were picked up by Warner Bros. and producer Arnold Kopelson, who moved the film into production within 10 months of the acquisition.

Matthews, by this time back in Wisconsin, did get to work intensely with Costa-Gavras on the script, but inevitably the moment arrived when he was "essentially dismissed" and re-writers were brought in. "Of course I knew that any Hollywood writer must have a thick skin, but when it finally happens to you, it hurts a bit," says Matthews. "I feel the producers, director and cast are usually denying themselves a major resource by arbitrarily deciding not to let the original screenwriter continue all the way. The guy who wrote the script knows the story better than anyone. He's been down all the blind alleys already and can tell them why those ideas won't pan out 30 pages later. Obviously if the first writer truly can't deliver more than just a good story idea, they have to find other writers, but too often, I feel, they instinctively bounce the original because that's just the way they do business."

"City" boys Dustin Hoffman and John Travolta.

However, Matthews did get to visit the set when they were shooting the museum interiors on a Hollywood sound stage and witnessed "over a hundred people gainfully employed because of something which came out of my head when I was sitting in my spare bedroom writing."

While writing, he imagined Alec Baldwin and John Goodman in the Hoffman and Travolta roles, but is certainly not at all unhappy with the finally casting. "In fact, I would be surprised if Travolta doesn't get an Oscar nomination," he says of the blue-collar role which allows the actor to keep the gut he acquired for "Michael."

Matthews admits that years of reviewing "way too many bad movies" have tarnished his dreams somewhat, just as taking too many bad meetings with potential producers has jaded his enthusiasm. But enough of his childhood aspirations survive from his days making "twisted little comedies" with a Super 8 camera he'd received for Christmas when he was 13.

Happier away from the Hollywood mainstream, Matthews is now gainfully employed in it. For producer Lynda Obst, he's drafted an adaptation of Tom Perrotta's comic novel "The Wishbones," about a guy in a New Jersey wedding band whose rock-and-roll dreams are slipping away. He's wrapping up a spec script, "Fireworks," an ironic screwball comedy about a man who stages his own death because he feels unwanted, then finds he has misjudged the situation and has to bring himself back to life. "The Shredder," his satire on capital punishment, once in development at New Line, is again attracting attention.

Now if only screenwriting didn't entail trips to Hollywood for pitch meetings and rewrite conferences, his dreams would have indeed come true.

"Mad City." Starring John Travolta and Dustin Hoffman. Directed by Costa-Gavras. Written by Tom Matthews. Produced by Arnold Kopelson. A Warner release. Drama.

JANUARY TRAILERS

Welcome to our winter of content. And what a lot of content there is.

It's a new year, and it's a new era for exhibitors and audiences. During the 1990s, the studios have begun in some earnest to do what theatre folks and theatregoers have long wanted: to make the movie business a 12-month business. So 1998 opens with great expectations.

And, of course, with "Great Expectations," the first weekend's only new release. A sign of the times, however, the following frames are full of studio and big-indie fare. Perhaps too full, or too full unadroitly: Unlike this past November, in which no opening film went head to head with another new release for the same demographic on the same weekend, this month looks more contentious. The 1/9 weekend is one example, with "Senseless," "Wag the Dog" and "Welcome to Woop Woop" each after all or parts of the comedy crowd.

Seven days later, the thrillers "Fallen" and "Desperate Measures" and the action/drama "Hard Rain" all go after similar demos in their attempts to maximize returns over what for some moviegoers is a three-day weekend (Jan. 19 being Martin Luther King Day). The 1/23 frame seems to be Distaff Days, with the pop-umentary "Spice World," romance drama "Courtesan" and romantic comedy "Still Breathing" appearing to favor the female moviegoer and give the male-trending 1/16 trio a second weekend of free play. Then it's the male set that returns to the fore at month's close, with actioners "Firestorm" and "Deep Rising" going head to head with each other on 1/30 and also banging the boards against the thriller "Incognito" and detective drama "The Magic Hour."

Will those great expectations be realized? Well, it might not be harmful if this-here month, as in Dickens' story, had some sort of guardian angel looking after it.

JANUARY 2

Great Expectations

This contemporary retelling of Charles Dickens' classic Victorian novel follows the journey of aspiring artist Finn Bell ("Gattaca's" Ethan Hawke), whose life is invaded by a dangerous convict named Lustig (Robert De Niro), the beautiful but icy Estella ("The Pallbearer's" Gwyneth Paltrow) and an old, crazed eccentric, Nora Dinsmoor ("G.I. Jane's" Anne Bancroft). Chris Cooper ("Lone Star") and Hank Azaria ("The Birdcage") co-star. Alfonso Cuaron ("A Little Princess") directs; Mitch Glazer ("Three of Hearts") scripts; Art Linson ("The Edge") produces. (Fox, 12/31 ltd, 1/16 wide)

Exploitips: Last year's big literary adaptation—"The Crucible," also from Fox—underperformed ticket and Oscar expectations, and that was with the august Daniel Day-Lewis in the lead. Although Hawke in comparison might recall a certain vice-presidential tongue-lashing ("I knew Jack Kennedy..."), perhaps his teaming with Paltrow and the contemporary setting will pull the necessary twentysomething crowd, especially given that this is the week's sole debut. Cuaron's touch was near-perfect directing "A Little Princess," though that's a salable credit only with the few who saw it. Despite the "Great Expectations" temporal update, a bookstore tie-in could aid with distaff and collegiate types.

Dark City

Originally a Fox project (and aka "Dark Empire"), this futuristic thriller stars Rufus Sewell ("Cold Comfort Farm") as a man who is wanted for murders he can't remember. He soon learns that his memories and his life as he knows it (and those of other people's) are artificial creations. William Hurt, Kiefer Sutherland and Jennifer Connelly also star. Alex Proyas ("The Crow") directs, and he scripts with Lem Dobbs ("Kafka") and David Goyer ("The Crow: City of Angels"); Andrew Mason produces. See our June 1997 issue Sneak Preview. (New Line, 1/9 on 1,600 screens)

Exploitips: Previously a summer and then fall release, "Dark City"—at least for weekend #1—can count on the dependable SF crowd, which could be pulled by the filmmakers' various "Crow" credits, especially Proyas'. Unlike its previous dates, which slated it against direct genre competitors "Kull the Conqueror" and "Gattaca," the 1/9 frame gives "Dark City" its key demo to itself.

Senseless

In this Penelope Spheeris ("The Little Rascals") comedy, a cash-starved collegian ("The 6th Man's" Marlon Wayans) works four jobs but still can't pay his bills. He agrees to be in a university medical experiment supposed to heighten his senses, which it does—but then starts causing bouts when one or another of his senses fail, leading to comic interludes. David Spade and Rip Torn co-star. David Hoberman and Eric L. Gold produce. (Miramax, 1/9 wide)

Exploitips: This looks to have urban audiences to itself, and it could add to its exclusive mix the less demanding among comedy audiences (the good-timey type who is unlikely to sample, for example, the arthouse mirth of "Welcome to Woop Woop"), so highlight Spheeris' "Wayne's World" credit, even if a bit dated. "Wag the Dog," which has star power, could cut into this one's mainstream ticket take.

Wag the Dog

In this satire, a White House adviser (Robert De Niro) and a Hollywood producer (Dustin Hoffman) conspire to stage a war in order to take the public's focus off the president's scandalous dalliances. In their efforts, they fabricate a hero—who turns out to be a mentally deranged soldier. Anne Heche ("Volcano"), Woody Harrelson, Denis Leary, Willie Nelson and Kirsten Dunst co-star. Barry Levinson directs; Hilary Henkin ("Romeo Is Bleeding") and David Mamet ("The Edge") script; Jane Rosenthal, Robert De Niro and Barry Levinson produce. (New Line, 1/9 after 12/24 NY/LA bow)

Exploitips: Although this De Niro/Levinson ("Sleepers") reteaming arrives care of New Line, placing the distributor—which also opens "Dark City" this date—in competition with itself, more to the point genre- and demo-wise are "Senseless" and "Welcome to Woop Woop." Highlight the high-profile talent involved with this "Canadian Bacon" variant to help separate it from the comedy pack; unlike the lower-brow Miramax release and higher-brow Goldwyn, "Wag the Dog" could draw both crowds.

Welcome to Woop Woop

In this comedy (aka "The Big Red") based on a Douglas Kennedy novel, an American con man ("That Thing You Do!'s"

The Boxer

A once-promising fighter returns home after spending 13 years in a British prison, only to find his city of Belfast now a place full of hatred and desolation. He returns to the ring, determined to find a way out of the legacy of despair, and he rekindles a romance with his former lover ("Breaking the Waves'" Emily Watson), who now has both a husband who's himself in prison and a teenaged son that she is raising. In a creative reteaming of four "In the Name of the Father" principals, Daniel Day-Lewis stars, Jim Sheridan directs, Sheridan scripts with Terry George, and Sheridon produces with Arthur Lappin for Hell's Kitchen Prods. (Universal, 1/9/98 wide after 12/26 ltd bow)

Exploitips: The prestige project "In the Name of the Father" pulled just $24 million for Uni after a 12/93 opening, and that was with Emma Thompson aboard. And that was $10 million better than the Sheridan/Day-Lewis "My Left Foot" managed with a best-picture Oscar. Although Day-Lewis did draw $74 million for "The Last of the Mohicans," most likely "The Boxer" is a title an exhibitor can book with and for pride, knowing it'll pull select serious audiences. By mid-February, when Oscar might come calling with noms, ticket-sales percentages will be swinging into exhibitors' favor.

Johnathan Schaech) is forced to hide out in an isolated Australian town named Woop Woop. Rod Taylor ("The Time Machine"), Noah Taylor ("Shine") and Paul Mercurio ("Strictly Ballroom") co-star. Stephan Elliott ("The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert") directs; Michael Thomas (Miramax's upcoming "B. Monkey") scripts; Finola Dwyer produces. (MGM/Goldwyn, 1/9 ltd)

Exploitips: Aussie entries have long seemed particularly palatable to American audiences (e.g., "My Brilliant Career," "Muriel's Wedding"), but to attract crossover moviegoers here it's playing up the participants' "Shine," "Strictly Ballroom" and (especially given the genre) "The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert" credits that should help make the sale. Given the Goldwyn lineage, one might expect most mainstreamers to opt for "Senseless" or "Wag the Dog" while the more serious-minded arthousers try...

Good Will Hunting

Matt Damon ("The Rainmaker") stars as Will Hunting, a remarkably bright but defiant young man from South Boston whose only hope to avoid a pending jail sentence is therapist Sean McGuire (Robin Williams, in "Dead Poets Society" mold), a former college professor with an admiration for Hunting's emotional struggles. Stellan Skarsgaard ("Amistad"), Ben Affleck ("Chasing Amy") and Minnie Driver (also in this month's "Hard Rain") co-star. Gus Van Sant ("To Die For") directs; thespians Matt Damon and Ben Affleck also handle scripting chores; Lawrence Bender ("Jackie Brown") produces. (Miramax, 1/9/98 wide after 12/5 NY/LA bow)

Exploitips: Given its close ties to Bender, Miramax—which has been accused of a see-what-sticks release approach—seems to be providing this full support; the distributor says it changed the exclusive bow from 12/25 to 12/5 to heighten Oscar awareness. Also, Williams' presence plus the choice of release pattern suggest the distributor expects strong coastal response to help persuade midlands auds to try out Van Sant product. If Coppola's "The Rainmaker" has been a hit, the Damon name should be a young-crowd pull.

JANUARY 16

Fallen

After the conviction and execution of a serial killer that had been apprehended by two Chicago detectives, a new series of murders done in the late killer's peculiar style begins. Even as suspicion falls on one of the detectives, he works to unravel the mystery, only to come face to face with a surprising adversary: a fallen angel. Denzel Washington, John Goodman, Donald Sutherland and Embeth Davidtz ("The Gingerbread Man") star. Gregory Hoblit ("Primal Fear") directs; Nicholas Kazan ("Dream Lover") scripts and exec produces; former Turner Pictures and Columbia head Dawn Steel produces with Chuck Roven. See photo, p. 16. (Warner, 1/16)

Exploitips: At one time a possible Arnold Schwarzenegger title on the New Line schedule, this supernatural thriller seems more in the mold of Washington's "Virtuosity" ($24 mil. domestic) than, say, "The Pelican Brief" ($101 mil.). But sophomore helmer Hoblit made the thinly scripted "Primal Fear" play larger onscreen and at the ticket counter ($56 mil.), and the supporting cast here backing up the wide-drawing Washington is quite strong. Emphasizing the Denzel presence and Hoblit's credit could pay decent dividends.

Desperate Measures

In this suspense thriller, San Francisco police officer Frank Connor ("Night Falls on Manhattan's" Andy Garcia) must find a bone marrow donor for his dying son. The one match is a vicious murderer, Peter McCabe ("Multiplicity's" Michael Keaton, in a change-of-pace role), who has plans of a more nefarious nature in mind. When McCabe makes the hospital a battleground by trying to use it to escape to freedom, Connor must both pursue and—for his son's sake—protect the killer. Brian Cox and Marcia Gay Harden co-star. Barbet Schroeder ("Before and After") directs, and he produces for Mandalay with Susan Hoffman (Schroeder's "Single White Female") and the "Tin Cup" duo, Lee Rich and Gary Foster; David Klass, Henry Bean (Garcia's "Internal Affairs") and Neal Jimenez ("Anaconda") script. (TriStar, 1/16)

Exploitips: Schroeder's recent efforts haven't been blockbusters—a commodity that the talented Garcia also still lacks. The family/peril narrative, as variously used in the likes of "Ransom," "Cape Fear" and "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle," can be the genre's strongest, however, and as such those elements in the storyline should be played up—especially given that the mainstream demos being targeted here will also have two other high-profile entries from which to choose: "Fallen" and "Hard Rain." "Desperate Measures" was held by the studio from an overcrowded August 1997 date.

Half-Baked

In this comedy, three hapless young men take desperate measures of their own to spring their friend from jail. Harland Williams ("RocketMan"), Dave Chappelle ("The Nutty Professor"), Jim Breuer (TV's "Saturday Night Live") and Guillermo Diaz ("Girls Town") star with Rachel True ("The Craft") and Laura Silverman. Tamara Davis ("CB4") directs; Neal Brennan and Dave Chappelle script; Robert Simonds ("Happy Gilmore") produces. (Universal, 1/16 wide)

Exploitips: As currently accoutered, the 1/16 frame is a packed one. "Half-Baked," however, faces only Miramax's "The Mighty" in genre competition. Given its storyline, and with Peter Chelsom directing and Sharon Stone starring, "The Mighty" could draw older, even as "Half-Baked" grabs the young male set at the multiplex.

Hard Rain

This disaster/crime thriller, aka "The Flood," follows a Midwestern sheriff ("ID4's" Randy Quaid) who must evacuate the residents of a small town when torrential rains threaten to flood the area. Meanwhile, an armored car breaks down and the driver ("Broken Arrow's" Christian Slater) is stranded and soon surrounded not only by thigh-high waters but by gunmen. Morgan Freeman ("Kiss the Girls") and Minnie Driver ("Grosse Pointe Blank") co-star. Mikael Salomon (who helmed "A Far Off Place") directs; Graham Yost ("Speed") scripts; Mark Gordon (also "Speed"), Gary Levinsohn ("The Real McCoy") and Ian Bryce (yet another "Speed"-er) produce. See the Sneak Preview in our April 1997 issue. (Paramount, 1/16 wide)

Exploitips: Watching surface water swirl by isn't quite the thrill of watching a whole tornado tear through, and the low-key setting is more Mayberry than Manhattan, so repeat business for "Hard Rain"—originally slated for 5/2/97—will depend more on plot and character than did, say, "Twister" or the upcoming "Godzilla." Still, it's worthwile to emphasize the various makers' "Speed" credits. Have a bit of Wall Drug promotion fun and offer ticketbuyers free water.

Star Kid

Aka "The Warrior of Waverly Street," this long-on-the-schedule children's sci-fi adventure tells the story of a 12-year-old boy ("Jurassic Park's" Joseph Mazzello) who finds a cybersuit. When he puts it on, he is thrust into a virtual-reality world and becomes involved in the efforts of a friendly alien nation striving to do good and evil beings intent on destroying mankind. Corinne Hohrer ("The Bridges of Madison County"), Joey Simmrin ("Nine Months") and young Japanese superstar Yumi Adachi co-star. Manny Coto ("Dr. Giggles") directs and scripts; Jennie Lew Tugend (the "Free Willy" and "Lethal Weapon" trios) produces. (Trimark, 1/16)

Exploitips: Although it's yet to have its breakout success, Trimark continues to try to define itself as a wide-ranging maker of films for families, mainstream auds and arthousers. Its last for the young types, the 1994 Sissy Spacek fantasy "Trading Mom," found no boxoffice magic, but in production coinage "Star Kid" represents Trimark's biggest outlay to date. The distributor had earlier planned a fall 1996 rollout, then March and then August 1997, and at one time—before a similar plan led to a $3 million writeoff on "Meet Wally Sparks"—it had set a $14 million P&A budget to back "Star Kid."

The Real

Rap stars LL Cool J and Snoop Doggy Dog star with Bokeem Woodbine ("Jason's Lyric") in this drama about a young man raised in the 'hood who, wanting to make a new life for himself after exiting prison, finds his luck heading south again. Darin Scott ("Tales From the Hood" writer/producer) makes his directing debut; Peter Heller ("Hotel de Love") produces. (Live, 1/16; could go late month)

Exploitips: Expect heavy male turnout in urban areas, especially if released for MLK Day, even if likely to be a lighter draw in the suburbs. The key selling point is the presence of the rappers in the cast. Recently refinanced Live—like Gramercy—plans to periodically release urban-drawing fare along with its more mainstream efforts.

The Mighty

In this imaginative comedy/drama, two outcast boys—Maxwell Kane, a giant, slow-witted boy, and Kevin, a tiny, sickly but super-intelligent child—team to face fights with local hoods and also adventures both mythical and real. Sharon Stone, Kieran Culkin, Gillian Anderson (TV's "The X-Files"), Harry Dean Stanton and Gena Rowlands co-star. Peter Chelsom (the success d'estime "Funny Bones") directs; Charles Leavitt ("Sunchaser") and Rodman Philbrick adapt Philbrick's novel; Simon Fields and Jane Startz produce. (Miramax, 1/16 wide after 12/19 NY/LA bow)

Exploitips: One critic called "Funny Bones" "extraordinarily strange," and this one sounds not all that ordinary also. From the days of its disastrous launch of 1993's "Into the West," Miramax has wanted to establish a family label; even more than with Miramax's recent "Wide Awake," the question here seems to be whether the distributor wants to pull children to stories about children or adults to stories about children.

Spice World

Aka "The Spice Girls Movie" and "Spice—The Movie," this musical comedy mockumentary stars pop music's sassy, all-female and perhaps flavor-of-the-minute British group the Spice Girls in a story about a group of girl singers aiming to make their live debut. Richard E. Grant ("Jack & Sarah") co-stars. Bob Spiers (still better known for the Brit TV export "Absolutely Fabulous" than for his Disney "That Darn Cat" remake) directs; Brit sitcom writer Kim Fuller scripts; Uri Fruchtmann and Barnaby Thompson produce for Polygram's London-based Fragile Films. (Columbia, 1/23)

Exploitips: When Sony acquired North and South American rights at Cannes, SPE topper John Calley said the Spice Girls "had reached a unique point in their career." That point includes just one #1 tune in America, though four have been chart-toppers in the U.K., with an album—only their second—slated for Christmas release. Expect the strongest response from those too young to know Bananarama, especially the young-girl Tiger Beat crowd. Tie-ins with music stores are naturals, as are cross-promos with your local MTV-carrying cable operator (MTV now catering to the teeny- and preteeny-bopper set).

Courtesan

Catherine McCormack (most recently in "Loaded," but better known for "Braveheart") and Moira Kelly (ditto for "Entertaining Angels" and "The Tie That Binds") star in this romantic period drama—aka "The Honest Courtesan," "Venice" and "Indiscretion"—set in 16th-century Venice, about a poor but beautiful woman (McCormack) who seeks power to win the man she loves (Rufus Sewell, also in "Dark City"). Jacqueline Bisset co-stars. Marshall Herskovitz ("Jack the Bear") directs; Jeanine Dominy ("Incognito") adapts the novel by Margaret Rosenthal; Ed Zwick ("Courage Under Fire"), Marshall Herskovitz, Sarah Caplan, Arnon Milchan and Michael Nathanson produce for New Regency. (Warner, 1/23)

Exploitips: Romance dramas play best with the distaff set, and period efforts draw older, so this has only indirect debut-day competition (from "Spice World" and "Still Breathing"). The studio originally had slated this for a Christmas limited release and January expansion—Christmas 1996 and January 1997, that is. But it's still true that bookstore tie-ins should be especially effective, given more bookstore patrons are women than men.

Four Days in September

This Portuguese-language film tells the story of young Brazilians—including an inflexible rebel leader (Fernanda Torres), a zealot-in-training (Calo Junqueira), an innocent (Claudia Abreu) destined to be hardened by experience, and an idealist (Pedro Cardoso)—who kidnap an American ambassador ("Mother Night's" Alan Arkin) as a way of protesting the policies of their country's military regime. Bruno Barreto ("Carried Away") directs; Leopoldo Serran scripts; Lucy Barreto produces. (Miramax, 1/23 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Our Berlin fest critic (June 1997 issue) gave this Producoes Cinematograficas LC Barreto production a commendable three stars, citing Barreto's storytelling prowess, calling the kidnapping operation "thrillingly rendered." But the reviewer said that characterization tends toward types, and "the connections with larger themes that make a good movie a great one are missing. Most of the time, the film comes off as a very well-made and well-acted TV cop drama set in a tropical locale." A demo plus: This is the date's only new foreign-language or serious art fare.

Still Breathing

In this romance, a young Texas street performer, Fletcher ("George of the Jungle's" Brendan Fraser), and a professional con artist from Los Angeles named Roz ("Little City's" Joanna Going) manage to overcome their differences and fall in love thanks to Fletcher's psychic ability and a case of mistaken identity. Ann Magnuson, Lou Rawls and Michael McKean co-star. James F. Robinson directs and scripts, and he produces with Marshall Persinger. (October Films, 1/23)

Exploitips: New Universal division October acquired this after its Seattle-fest appearance, which generated a citable best-actor kudos for Fraser. In a 1 1/2-star review (Oct. 1997 issue), however, our Seattle critic called this film "an unwanted suitor striving to make us like it," citing a lack of sparks between the two players and Robinson's quirky direction and plodding pacing. Still, for couples looking for a date movie over the holiday weekend, "Still Breathing" is the only choice.

JANUARY 30

Deep Rising

In this action/thriller creature feature set in the South China Sea, a cruise ship becomes a chamber of horrors for hijackers led by Hanover ("Geronimo: An American Legend's" Wes Studi) and for the passengers, including John Finnegan ("The Phantom's" Treat Williams), after a monster from the depths invades the vessel. Famke Janssen ("GoldenEye") co-stars. Stephen Sommers ("Rudyard Kipling's The Jungle Book") directs and scripts; Laurence Mark ("Jerry Maguire") and John Baldecchi ("Gunmen") produce. (Buena Vista, 1/30)

Exploitips: If not outside then inside theatres, this January seems more like summer, what with male-trenders like "Fallen," "Desperate Measures" and "Hard Rain" trying to dominate the multiplexes. To separate this from the competition, emphasize the action and creature elements. Originally a fall 1997 release, "Deep Rising" was moved to February and now advanced to 1/30, where (unless one exits) it faces a direct demo battle with...

Firestorm

Former football star and current NFL commentator Howie Long ("Broken Arrow") stars in this action/adventure about Jesse Graves, a smokejumper who, in the middle of fighting a forest-fire inferno, comes upon escaped convicts disguised as fellow firefighters. As a friend and mentor ("Courage Under Fire's" Scott Glenn) tries to find him, Graves must outsmart the criminals' cunning leader ("Palookaville's" William Forsythe) and rescue an innocent hostage ("Blown Away's" Suzy Amis). Cinematographer Dean Semler (Oscar winner for "Dances With Wolves") makes his directing debut; Chris Soth and Graham Yost (also "Hard Rain") script; Tom M. Hammel, Matthew Weisman and Joseph Loeb III produce. (Fox, 1/30)

Exploitips: This might move into February and thus evade the actioner-vs.-actioner conflict with "Deep Rising." If it doesn't, play up the genre but also the presence of Long, who is well-respected by the ticketbuyers most likely to attend: the males who watch Sunday sports and don't care that much about cinematic pedigree. Although football season is over by opening day, earlier cross-promos with your local Fox TV outlet could draw on the Long following and build awareness.

The Magic Hour

Paul Newman, Susan Sarandon, Gene Hackman and Stockard Channing ("The First Wives Club") star in this contemporary detective story set in Los Angeles. Reese Witherspoon ("Fear"), Giancarlo Esposito ("Fresh") and James Garner co-star. Newman reteams here with his "Nobody's Fool" success d'estime creators: writer/director Robert Benton (who co-scripts with Richard Russo) and producers Arlene Donovan and Scott Rudin, who's on a winning streak for his studio. (Paramount, 1/30 ltd)

Exploitips: This has "well-made" stamped on it, given the talents before and behind the camera. This could also trend toward more mature audiences, given Newman's (and Benton's) established reputation with that demo. Emphasize those strengths and expect audience support to take a couple weekends to build (whether booked for the limited bow or the later expansion), given that mature moviegoers aren't frequent first-nighters.

Incognito

An art forger decides to make one final copy and then go straight. When his associates frame him for stealing the "original" artwork, he must flee for his life. Jason Patric ("Speed 2: Cruise Control"), Irene Jacob ("Othello") and Rod Steiger star. John Badham directs; Jeannie Dominy (this month's "Courtesan") scripts; Morgan Creek head James G. Robinson produces. (Warner, 1/30 wide)

Exploitips: "Incognito" is of a genre that Morgan Creek likes ("White Sands," "Trial by Jury," "Diabolique"), but it's one the production company hasn't cracked. Despite recent casting missteps, Patric and Jacob can deliver onscreen; the question is, can Badham? His 11/95 "Nick of Time" grossed $8 million, and his four films before that averaged just $26 million. Warner held this from a 10/31 date, when it faced less studio-fare competition.

Tempting Fate

Aka "Shakespeare's Sister," an allusion to Virginia Woolf's essay about gender inequality, this drama tells the story of a feminist writer ("12 Monkeys'" Madeleine Stowe) who with her husband (William Hurt) consults a priest ("Hamlet's" Kenneth Branagh) about marital troubles. Romantic complications ensue. Blythe Danner and Neil Patrick Harris ("Starship Troopers") co-star. Lesli Linka Glatter ("Now and Then") directs; Rick Ramage scripts; Ted Field, Scott Kroopf and Diane Nabatoff produce for Interscope. (Gramercy, 1/30)

Exploitips: Originally a fall title, "Tempting Fate" now has the 1/30 weekend to itself in terms of arthouses, the more likely venue for this fare. In "The Magic Hour's" limited markets, however, "Tempting Fate" will face that competition. To maximize specialized turnout, emphasize the Branagh name; although controversy is said never to hurt, one might expect some grievances to be aired by the same Catholic groups that recently contested the TV series "Nothing Sacred," about a priest who questions his faith.

JANUARY UNDATED

Bulworth

In "Bulworth" (a tentative title; the project was initially called "Tribulations"), a wealthy U.S. senator (Warren Beatty) is in danger of being killed but, tired of life, sees no reason to avoid the hit that's been planned by a friend—until, that is, the senator meets a beautiful African-American woman (Halle Berry) from South Central Los Angeles. When he tries to call off the killing, he discovers his friend has vanished. Paul Sorvino, Oliver Platt, Jack Warden and Don Cheadle co-star. Warren Beatty also directs, scripts and produces. (Fox, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: This might not be as drama-laden as the description implies; early Fox materials depict the predicament thus: "He must frantically seek out the only one who can call off the killer in a hair-raising comic chase." So expect something more akin to "Heaven Can Wait" (which Beatty co-helmed and co-scripted) than to "Reds" (which he directed and co-scripted). Although Beatty directed 1990's "Dick Tracy" and produced and directed 1994's "Love Affair," that he handles all four key chairs here indicates a personal involvement that, as with "Reds," portends promise. Besides making another title change, Fox could move this to February.

Goodbye, Lover

In this black comedy/thriller, family members scheme to inherit a $4 million insurance policy. Patricia Arquette ("Flirting With Disaster") stars as the wife of one brother and mistress to another. Ellen DeGeneres ("Mr. Wrong") co-stars as a detective on a case of possible murder. Dermot Mulroney ("My Best Friend's Wedding"), Don Johnson and Mary-Louise Parker co-star. Roland Joffe ("The Scarlet Letter") directs; Ron Peer scripts; Arnon Milchan daughter Alexandra, who heads the more indie-oriented Regency Vision, produces with Patrick McDarrah, Joel Roodman and Chris Daniel. (Warner, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: The coming-out episode of DeGeneres' TV series "Ellen" likely raised her profile with moviegoers or at least replaced bad memories of "Mr. Wrong." Likewise, one wouldn't highlight Joffe's last credit, the much-derided "Scarlet Letter," but his older hits (e.g., "The Killing Fields") are of the wrong genre. So go with the gals—Arquette and DeGeneres—and target the month's underserved distaff clientele.

Kundun

Directed by Martin Scorsese, this drama recounts the life of the current Dalai Lama from his childhood through the Chinese invasion and on into his time in exile. Tenzin Thuthob Tsarong, Kunga J. Tenzin and Tenzin Gyalpo star. Melissa Mathison (best known for "E.T.") scripts; Barbara De Fina (Scorsese's "Casino") produces. (Buena Vista, widens mid-Jan. after 12/25 ltd bow)

Exploitips: Unless this delivers a good-hearted emotional wallop (hardly the Scorsese signature) that transcends America's "Tenzin" resistance to stories of other cultures, this looks to be a domestic prestige item for the studio and exhibitors, working best in select-site and high-profile bookings.

Hurricane Streets

In this drama (aka "Hurricane"), Brendan Sexton III ("Welcome to the Dollhouse") stars as a poor 15-year-old living with his grandmother who falls for a young Latina and dreams of a better life. Isidra Vega, Jared Harris ("I Shot Andy Warhol") and L.M. Kit Carson ("Running on Empty") co-star; Morgan J. Freeman directs and scripts, and he produces with Galt Niederhoffer and Gill Holland. See the Sneak Preview in our Sept. 1997 issue. (UA, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: This garnered three Sundance awards: best director, best cinematography,

LATE MOVIE MOVES INTO THE HOLIDAYS...

SCREAM 2

Wes Craven continues to raise his career and the horror genre from the dead with this sequel to the original blockbuster "Scream." The characters played by continuing cast members Neve Campbell, Courteney Cox,

Liev Schreiber and David Arquette are reunited two years later when they find some secrets from the past are better left forgotten. Jerry O'Connell ("Jerry Maguire"), Jada Pinkett ("The Nutty Professor") and Sarah Michelle Gellar ("I Know What You Did Last Summer") co-star. All four back from the original, Wes Craven directs, Kevin Williamson scripts, and Cathy Konrad and Marianne Maddalena produce. (Miramax/Dimension, 12/12 wide)

Exploitips: At least in part in response to rough-cut screening results, Miramax says, it returned this from a replacement 1/9 date to the original 12/12 frame and now plans a 3,000-screen debut (the company's largest ever), backed by event-picture ad spending and national cross-promos. Even if, as competing distributors charge, Miramax has cooked the numbers on the $103 million gross it claims for "Scream," the first entry in what Dimension hopes is a franchise was a wonderment to behold: grossing $6.4 million on its 12/20 opening (with "Beavis and Butt-head Do America" doing $20 mil.), then rising to capture another $9 million on weekend #2 and $10 million the next. What other screamer has done that? Having that presold base, combined with a lack of demo competition, should promise to make this a huge opener.

THE IMAX NUTCRACKER

E.T.A. Hoffmann's much-adapted classic story of a young girl who stumbles into an enchanted kingdom ruled by a wooden prince now makes it to the giant screen. This contemporary, mostly non-ballet version of the fairy tale incorporates Tchaikovsky's noted score, performed by England's Bournemouth Symphony. Miriam Margolyes ("Balto") and newcomers Lotte Johnson (as the girl) and Benjamin Hall (as the Nutcracker Prince) star. Christine Edzard, a Parisian whose background is in costume design, writing and/or directing for the likes of "Little Dorrit" and "Tales of Beatrix Potter," handles all three tasks here; Olivier Stockman and Lorne Orleans produce. (Imax Corp., 11/26)

Exploitips: This 40-minute film, which represents the largest simultaneous IMAX release ever, will bow at more than 150 theatres worldwide, both in 3-D and 2-D, depending on the venue technology. It's probably the grandest large-screen effort since 1995's "Wings of Courage," the first fiction film made using IMAX's then-new 3-D system. The benefits of the release timing are obvious; not only is this a holiday classic for the holidays, but the target audience—families—are looking for activities over the Thanksgiving and Christmas breaks, and theatre operators can expect heavy interest from elementary schools in between those two holiday periods.

Operation Cleansweep Factory Trade-In
of Old Stereo Processors!
Trade in any cinema stereo processor manufactured by Kintek or Dolby Labs, Inc, for a new, modern technology SMART Cinema Stereo Processor during our limited 90 day "Clean-sweep" program. From November 1, 1997 to January 30, 1998 we will send you a check from the factory for your old processor (dead or alive) when you purchase one of our latest models. Call your SMART dealer for the best price and get a check from the factory when you qualify.
Kintek has closed its doors and there are many early processors manufactured by Dolby Labs, Inc that require expensive update cards to meet today's sound requirements. It may make good business sense to buy a new processor with the latest technology and a new warranty.
Here's the way to save money:
$500 factory rebate on the SMART 8-channel MOD V 70mm/35mm stereo processor when you trade in a Kintek KT600 or CP-100 or CP200.
$300 factory rebate on 6-channel MOD IIC 1/3 octave EQ stereo processor for optical stereo and digital players when you trade in a Kintek 4 or 6 channel processor, or CP-50 and CT-55.
$200 factory rebate on any Kintek Front Surround package when you purchase a new SMART F/S package consisting of the MOD IIB F/S processor, MN580 Booth Monitor, EX550 exciter supply, TA250 power amplifier and wiring harness. Please call for more details.
The new SMART processors feature our DSP (Digital Signal Processing) X-ACT™ matrix for the cleanest sound you can buy. We will be happy to send you color literature on these products.

and audience. Our reviewer (April 1997 issue) gave it three stars, calling it "a boy's coming-of-age story on the order of '400 Blows'." This will likely play best at arthouses, though its "Romeo and Juliet" element could draw mainstream youths. Held from fall.

Afterglow

Nick Nolte ("Nightwatch") and Julie Christie star in this drama about the intertwined personal lives of two Montreal couples. Lara Flynn Boyle and Jonny Lee Miller ("Trainspotting") co-star. Alan Rudolph directs and scripts; former Rudolph mentor Robert Altman produces for Moonstone. (Sony Classics, mid-Jan. exp after 12/25 NY/LA bow)

Exploitips: The casting could draw both younger and older moviegoers of the select variety—of the select variety because of the Rudolph name. Rudolph for some is a taste never to be acquired; for others he's a leading arthouse light. For the latter, Rudolph will be the draw; look for positive fest and coastal notices to back this month's expansion.

The Blackout

After a movie star (Matthew Modine) kicks his addictions, he begins to have nightmares that he killed someone during a blackout. "Betty Blue's" Beatrice Dalle and ubermodel Claudia Schiffer co-star as old and new girlfriends; Dennis Hopper plays a sleazy filmmaker. Abel Ferrara ("The Funeral") directs, and he scripts with Marla Hanson and Christ Zois; Edward R. Pressman and Clayton Townsend produce. (Trimark, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: Our Cannes critic (July 1997 issue) gave this just a 1/2-star review. The complaints: the screen-friendly Modine isn't believable as an addict; the women characters are one-dimensional; and Ferrara's pacing is slack and his direction melodramatic. Still, one can play up the Ferrara name with the more grindy arthouse-goers, and Schiffer's presence should draw extra media attention.

Suicide Kings

In this black comedy, four collegians nab a retired mobster (Christopher Walken) to help them. Denis Leary ("Wide Awake"), Jay Mohr ("Picture Perfect"), Henry Thomas ("Legends of the Fall") and Sean Patrick Flanery ("Powder") also star. Peter O'Fallon directs; Wayne Rice and Gina Goldman script; Rice produces with Morrie Eisenman. (Live, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: If the ensemble here strikes sparks with the twentysomething crowd, this could build word of mouth in a way that "8 Heads in a Duffel Bag" did not. Our Toronto reviewer (Oct. 1997 issue) gave this three stars, citing Walken's energetic turn and certain intriguing twists in the narrative. Live held this from a Sept. 1997 bow.

The Tango Lesson

Filmmaker Sally Potter ("Orlando") recounts her romantic involvement with Argentine tango dancer Pablo Veron and her multicontinental efforts to make a film about the Latin dance. Christopher Sheppard (also "Orlando") produces. (Sony Classics, Jan. undated exp after 11/14 NY & 12/25 LA bows)

Exploitips: Potter's challenging "Orlando" grossed a good $7 million take in 1993, and highlighting that credit could draw arthouse audiences. Though "Orlando" would hardly have filled the bill, "The Tango Lesson"—rated a promotable PG (for brief language and some violent images)—might allow exhibitor outreach to local art programs.

Ayn Rand: A Sense of Life

Via stock footage, rare photos, taped interviews and film clips, writer/director/producer Michael Paxton documents the life of author/social theorist Ayn Rand, who wrote "The Fountainhead" and "Atlas Shrugged." Sharon Gless narrates. (Strand, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: Our 1996 Telluride critic (3/97 issue) gave this 3 1/2 stars, calling it "a vivid testament." Bookstore tie-ins are a natural.

Fallen Angels

This 1995 Wong Kar-wai film (a sort of epilogue to "Chungking Express") stars Hong Kong pop star Leon Lai as a tough yet sensitive hitman, Michelle Reis as the cool woman who organizes his schedule, Karen Mok as a platinum blonde that he desires and Kaneshiro Takeshi as a young mute man. Chen Yi-cheng produces. (Kino, Jan. undated)

Exploitips: This Cantonese-language film is likely to draw the same admirers, if in lesser number due to distributor, as attendees of the Miramax release "Chungking Express." Cite that film and Wong's newer "Happy Together," which Kino handled last fall.

SUNRISE, SUNSET

Internationally Acclaimed Abroad, Taiwanese Film Faces Trouble at Home by Karen Achenbach

The Taiwanese film industry is robust and on the rise internationally, but in Taiwan it's referred to as "The Sunset Industry" because it appears to be sinking. Taiwanese directors are producing innovative films that win awards, acclaim and boxoffice abroad, but they can't find an audience at home. Instead, the local boxoffice is dominated by Hollywood blockbusters and Hong Kong escapist fare.

In contrast to the approximately 400 foreign films released last year in Taiwan, there were only 15 domestic features. With little room to compete commercially, innovative Taiwanese filmmakers have been aggressively producing quality "art" films to great success around the world, but to little effect at home. "It has become a saying [in Taiwan] that winning an award means your film is not interesting to watch because it's serious," says Taiwanese film critic and scholar Robert Chen, who has written a book about the New Taiwanese Cinema and teaches film in Taiwan.

DIRECT ACCESS: Taiwanese director Wang Shaudi.

Fu Syou-ling, a young Taiwanese filmmaker now working in the United States, attributes the seriousness of Taiwanese "art" cinema to the history of the island itself. "Starting in the 1980s there were a lot of changes in Taiwan. Martial law had been rescinded and there was an economic boom, along with a new democracy movement. People started to reflect about their political past, and Taiwanese movies became almost personal."

Taiwan's political past needed to be reflected upon because the island had never been allowed to have a national identity. Taiwan's original aboriginal populations were colonized primarily by the Chinese. The Chinese ceded the island to Japan for 50 years of occupation during which time Japanese was made the official language. After Japan surrendered to the Allies at the end of World War II, the Nationalist Chinese government took over and Mandarin became the official language. When native Taiwanese rebelled in 1947, Nationalists massacred as many as 20,000 people (known as the 2.28 Incident because the event occurred on February 28, 1947). In the '50s, during a period called Taiwan's "White Terror," Nationalists persecuted and killed suspected communists. Only when martial law was rescinded in 1987 did a new democratic movement take hold and the Taiwanese were finally free to be Taiwanese.

This led to serious filmmaking about social and political issues that won international attention beginning in the 1980s. Edward Yang ("The Terrorists") and Hou Hsiao-hsien, whose "City of Sadness" addressed the 2.28 Incident, led this Taiwanese New Cinema, followed in the '90s by films like Wan Jen's heartbreaking tale of White Terror betrayals, "Super Citizen Ko."

Today Taiwanese audiences apparently reject any kind of introspection, even though new films focus on life in modern Taipei. Says Chen, "The public is not willing to see Taiwanese films."

But the public was willing in Los Angeles, where three new Taiwanese films premiered recently under the auspices of UCLA and the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. Two of the films were Lin Cheng-sheng's "Murmur of Youth," about teenage girls who bond to survive modern cruelties; and "The River," by Tsai Ming-laing.

Producer Huang Liming presented the third film, her comedy "Yours and Mine." Directed by Wang Shaudi, it's a raucous look at many angles of life in modern Taipei. In 1995, the two filmmakers formed Rice Film International; "Yours and Mine" is their company's third film, and has been chosen as the official entry of the Taiwanese government for the foreign language category of the Academy Awards.

Huang explained some of the reasons for this paradox: "The [Taiwanese] audience has developed the habit of not paying the ticket price for Taiwanese movies. They think Taiwanese movies should be watched on TV or video. This is killing Taiwanese movies, because people see your film cut apart on TV and then feel that Taiwanese movies are not good."

Videocassettes used to be issued only three weeks after a film's theatrical release, with cable screenings three months after release, giving audiences little incentive to pay the higher ticket prices in theatres. This past July, the video release window was extended to two months to help the industry.

As a result of audience attitude, theatres are reluctant to show local product, often screening with disregard for the printed schedules, or only in the mornings, when people are at work. There are approximately 200 screens in Taipei, but only a couple of theatre chains ever show Taiwanese films. To further aggravate the situation, the government allows up to 37 prints of a film (typically blockbusters like "ID4" or "The Lost World: Jurassic Park") to be shown at the same time in Taipei. According to Huang, "In 1995, the gross income for films distributed in Taiwan was about US $S69 million. Only 2.5 percent of that is Taiwanese product—about US $1.7 million."

It's no surprise then that Taiwanese commercial film companies refuse to support Taiwanese directors. Instead, they invest in co-productions with Hong Kong and Mainland China. Some films that audiences identify as coming from the Mainland ("Temptress Moon," "To Live," "Farewell, My Concubine") were produced in Hong Kong and financed by Taiwanese companies. These Taiwanese co-productions are often shot in China, where production costs are least expensive.

Will Britain's recent handover of Hong Kong to China effect the local industry? Chen says no. "The local commercial film companies don't really worry about the handover because their money is already there." Chen adds, "Maybe what [the Hong Kong handover raises is] worries about censorship. The day might come when the Chinese government will try to regulate what should and should not be produced. But that day hasn't come yet."

Incredible as it sounds, all of this leaves leading Taiwanese filmmakers—from premiere director Hou Hsao-hsien ("City of Sadness," "Dust in the Wind"), whose films defined a nation reasserting its identity after successive occupations, to the new sensation Tsai Ming-liang (known for his gritty urban youth dramas "Rebels of the Neon God," "Vive l'Amour" and "The River")—dependent upon government funds.

"The only sponsorship available for filmmakers is from the government fund," asserts Chen. The Government Information Office (GIO) has a yearly competition to award seed grants for films. This year they'll offer nine films about $345,999 each, typically one-half to one-third of the total budget. The filmmakers must raise the rest of the money and align with a production and distribution company to receive the grant.

The fund comes in part from a tax on boxoffice receipts, about 50 cents from every $10. Deciding which films get chosen is a jury composed of film artists and film scholars, plus producers and distributors, most of them from the very production companies that supply the rest of the budget money.

This creates some conflicts. The producers and distributors lobby for films with commercial potential, while the scholars and film artists argue for more serious work. In addition, some producers don't add the GIO seed money to a film's budget, but use the money to cut their risks, according to Free China Review Magazine, which covers the Taiwanese business scene.

Huang has been lucky enough to win seed money grants for four of her films. As for finding matching funds, for two films she went to the Nationalist Chinese-owned Central Motion Picture Company (CMPC), the oldest and biggest film company and distributor in Taiwan. They provided the two-thirds matching funds, and Huang signed over all the rights to the films.

However, she and director Wang were responsible for marketing, promotion, even distribution. Local distributors do not want Taiwanese films, "so they are not active," says Huang. "I do all the promotion work myself." But independently produced films cannot be shown in theatres without going through the existing distributors, and even with a distributor, the theatres are a problem.

FOREVER MINE: A neo-realist image from "Yours and Mine," one example of the kinds of indigenous art-house product being created in contemporary Taiwan.

Chen explains, "You need to pay up front to a theatre, to guarantee they will play the film. And then if your film is not as successful as suspected, the theatre has the right to pull it, with no money back."

"Even though you have an agreement to show certain times and days, the theatre will pull you out" if your numbers are low, says Huang. She and Wang Shaudi opened "Yours and Mine" against "The Lost World: Jurassic Park," though they were warned against it, but "there is just no space between the big American films, so we put ours out on that weekend. After one week they took our film out of the multiplex which was playing three 'Lost World' prints, and played a fourth 'Lost World' in our theatre."

Filmmakers find new solutions. "After the theatrical release of 'Yours and Mine,'" says Huang, "we had a second run of the movie in a bookstore that had a small theatre, and the result came out better than the theatres. After that, we were approached by one [chain] that is willing to show our film in their theatres in a very good district."

Filmmakers often screen without charge in cultural centers and classrooms like Chen's at the universities. It's a survival strategy: Directors desperately need to win back the Taiwanese audience. Take the case of "Ah Tsong," a 1996 film directed by Chang Zhou-gi about a rural youth in a type of ghost dance ceremony. The film made back its costs with international awards before it was shown in Taiwan. At that point, the director had two choices: screen for free in order build an audience, or try a theatrical release. If Chang screened for free, he'd lose no money, but he decided to release theatrically. He spent US $103,448 for the theatre, plus costs for copies and promotion. "Ah Tsong" got low attendance, was pulled from the theatre, and Chang lost the money.

There is only one bankable director in Taiwan, Chu Yan-peng, who remakes popular Hong Kong or Hollywood films and draws a younger audience. (Surprisingly, he also applies for government seed grants, though he doesn't need the money.) Of the 15 domestic features Taiwan released last year, 10 were funded by GIO seed money. The other five came from Chu Yan-peng.

Today there is virtually no export market for Taiwanese films except for international film festivals. If a film does well, there are subsequent sales to TV stations and art cinemas abroad. So filmmakers frequently seek international cooperation. Hou Hsiao-hsien received Japanese capital for "City of Sadness" (which won the Golden Lion at Venice in 1995), and for "Puppetmaster."

Ang Lee, the one breakout Taiwanese director, found American producers. Lee went to film school in the U.S., and has lived there since 1978. His first film, "Pushing Hands," started with a Taiwanese (GIO) grant, but was produced by James Schamus and Ted Hope of New York's Good Machine, and only distributed in Asia. "The Wedding Banquet," "Eat Drink Man Woman" (Lee's last Taiwanese production) and "Sense and Sensibility" followed. Lee's latest film, "The Ice Storm," has been called the best film of 1997 by influential critics Gene Siskel and Roger Ebert.

Chen hopes for validation of the local industry. "Most of the directors in Taiwan chose to make art oriented films and to make a record in the history of cinema. When I write another book on Taiwanese cinema, I'll write about Hou Hsaio-hsien, I'll write about Edward Yang. I'll write about 'The River' and Tsai Ming Liang. I won't write anything about [populist director] Chu Yan-peng. He will be forgotten after several years."

THE ENVOY

MPAA President Jack Valenti Receives CineAsia's First-Ever International Distinguished Service Award

by Melissa Morrison

Jack Valenti has seen a lot in his life. As a decorated combat pilot, he flew B-25s from Italy during World War II. As a pressman riding in the infamous 1963 Kennedy motorcade in Dallas, he witnessed one of America's most soul-rattling events. As part of LBJ's administration for three years, he had a balcony view of one of the most tumultuous decades in American history. When he joined the Motion Picture Association of America in 1966 as its head, he oversaw industry history, establishing a rating system, presciently launching a worldwide anti-piracy movement, and expanding the now 75-year-old organization's reach into the realms of home video, television and, most recently, cyberspace. Valenti, who along with the MPAA will receive CineAsia's debut International Distinguished Service Award in Singapore on Dec. 3, says he has made history by always keeping an eye on the future.

PRESSING THE FLESH: Jack Valenti and friend.

"My greatest achievement? I survived," he told BOXOFFICE in a recent interview. "I'm not joking. I think survival is not an inconsiderable asset. I've survived, because I've tried to move with the times and not be rigid with my judgments. We're always looking to the future. I don't want to be like a Bourbon king of France with eyes in the back of my head... I'm really not so obsessed with the past as I am fascinated with the future."

The Wild West of the World Wide Web is his latest frontier, namely its potential to illicitly transmit movies and videos across cyberspace as easily as cattle rustlers thieving on the open range. Valenti urged Congress on Sept. 16 to protect intellectual property by ratifying two treaties negotiated in late 1996 in Geneva by the World Intellectual Property Organization.

"It's the biggest issue around the world," he says of piracy. "It's a cancer in the belly of our business. It's like a virus that flies around the world, and it's endemic everywhere which means we must be vigilant."

Asia—with roaring economies such as Taiwan's and China's, and its teeming Chinese and Indian populations—has major entertainment corporations salivating. But it poses an industry threat along with its promise. As Valenti told Congress, "In China, in Russia, in Italy, in scores of other countries, video pirates steal more than $2 billion of our intellectual property each year."

The MPA (the internationally focused offshoot of the MPAA) has made progress reining in pirates. In June, it signed an agreement with Chinese customs to protect copyrights. In March, two undercover MPA officials helped bust a Malaysian factory, where 30,000 pirated video CDs were seized. In 1996, the MPA participated in 515 similar raids.

But Valenti intends to address a more brotherly topic when he accepts his award in Singapore.

"I'm going to be talking about the community of filmmaking," he says, "because I think the grammar of film is the same in any language, the actors are just speaking a different language on screen. The structure of film, the storytelling is the same, which is why the community of filmmaking leaps beyond borders.

"When people wake up in morning, they don't say, 'Let's see a Japanese film,' or 'Let's see a Chinese film.' They say, 'What's on that's good?'"

But even though the MPAA's mandate is to make the world's markets more accessible to American entertainment, Valenti plans to reassure his audience that Hollywood doesn't want cultural hegemony in Asia's blooming markets. "What America strives for is not to be number one, but number two in those countries—number two in China, number two in Korea. The people in those countries want to see movies in their own language first."

In describing his plan for how to lure local audiences to homemade films, Valenti plans to hit a refrain familiar to anyone who's followed the public pronouncements of this avid free marketeer: "Government cannot cause good movies to be made," he says. "In fact, it can be a barrier to good film. The artist doesn't want to be cabined, cribbed and confined behind artificial barriers erected by governments operating under the defunct mythology that they can somehow cause every film coming out of that country to be loved by everybody."

Read "defunct mythology" as prohibitive taxes and cultural protectionism that limits the exhibition of other countries' movies, videos and TV programs. Speak those words in Asia, though, and they could also could refer to the censorship policies of countries such as China. China's Ministry of Propaganda has long stifled artists whose work doesn't jibe with the communist government's values, but it cracked down harder just before Deng Xiaoping died in 1996, when it canceled the film version of popular novelist Wang Shuo's comedy, "An Awkward Life," for example, and refused to release Chen Kaige's 1996 Cannes-exhibited film "Temptress Moon" domestically. More recently, the summer return of Hong Kong from British to Chinese hands has put the former colony's frenetic film industry on guard.

Such issues, however, don't keep Valenti awake nights. "There's censorship boards in every country in the world," he says. "They're in the European Union, in Latin American countries, Canada, Australia—many countries in Asia have government intervention in television and film. I'm not pointing a finger at China. It's in illustrious company. My point is, in most countries, governments intervene in one way or another in television, home video and cinema arenas."

The areas of censorship and the free market may soon overlap. The films "Seven Years In Tibet," which opened in October and stars Brad Pitt, and Martin Scorsese's "Kundun," which opens on Christmas Day, both bring attention to China's 1950 invasion of Tibet and the subsequent Chinese oppression of Tibetan Buddhists. The latter film prompted the Chinese to chill Disney, the company that made "Kundun," with a threat against conducting any of its mega-business in the most populous country in the world.

On this topic, the normally voluble Valenti doesn't have much to say.

"I don't want to get into that," he says. "My guess is no one wants to see film restricted, but China is a sovereign nation—it has a right to do whatever it thinks is good for people." Besides, "we only had 10 pictures shown in China last year. Out of 160 pictures, only 10."

As for the industry's future, the man who believes his MPAA legacy is one of facing forward has no idea. "I haven't the foggiest," he says. "Bill Gates can't tell you where we'll be in four or five years. It's like a roulette table. Our companies are investing in four or five years, placing bets."

The advent of digital transmission will have an impact on how people around the world receive and choose their entertainment, as will the World Wide Web, that much he knows. But he can't predict what kind of an impact all this will have.

"People thought movies would be obliterated by cable, but last year more people went to movies than in the past 40 years," he says. "That's with surfing the Web, satellite, cable, television—people are still going to movies in greater numbers.

"The answer is in the human condition. People don't want to be chained to an electronic box, they want to have a social experience. They still say, 'Let's go to a movie and get a pizza after.'"

FIRST "RATE"

A Brief Historical Summary of the Rise of Jack Valenti, CARA and the MPAA

by Jon A. Walz

CineAsia's first-ever Lifetime Achievement Award will be given to one of the most deserving figures this magazine can think of: the MPAA's legendary Jack Valenti. Valenti's accomplishments and influence almost defy description; during his 30 year career, it can honestly be said that virtually no one involved with the film industry has had greater, perhaps even comparable influence.

Because of the breadth of Valenti's achievements, we felt a bit of historical perspective was called for. So here, with our best regards, is a thumbnail sketch of the Valenti's legacy— or at least his legacy so far. One thing those of us who cover the screen trade know by heart is that, when you're talking about an energetic achiever like Jack Valenti, anything you have to say will always be at least one step behind.

While the Motion Picture Association of America, or MPAA, is best known as the originator and custodian of the movie—and now, television—ratings system, its legacy of promoting and protecting the U.S. film industry as a collective dates back to well before synchronized sound invaded Hollywood, Grauman's Chinese Theatre was constructed or the Academy Award was even conceived. Today, the organization's mandate has been broadened to include such duties as congressional and other governmental lobbying, drafting international treaties specific to the U.S. motion picture industry, collecting royalties, and detecting and eliminating film piracy.

The organization is funded entirely by fees paid by its seven members, the major studio releasing companies: Buena Vista, MGM, Paramount, Sony, Fox, Universal, and Warner Bros. The studios are required to submit every film, trailer, and print advertisement to an independent division of the MPAA, called the Classification and Ratings Administration, or CARA, for rating or approval. In return, the MPAA works to guarantee that all films and advertisements are acceptable to general audiences in every community in the nation.

CARA, which is headed by Jack Valenti, president of the MPAA, and William F. Kartozian, president of the National Association of Theatre Owners, is not an approval board like its predecessor, the Production Code Administration, or PCA. Under the stalwart hand of Valenti's predecessor, Will H. Hayes, content of the member studios' films was either "approved" or "disapproved" by the PCA. The PCA's reign lasted from the late '30s until the advent in 1968 of the new ratings system, which was fought for and designed under the guidance of Jack Valenti.

As movies in the '50s and '60s began to reflect a new, gritty realism—exposing the public for the first time to language and sexual content previously deemed inappropriate—parents and parental groups began to complain that their children could potentially be exposed to objectionable content. Iconoclastic filmmakers like Otto Preminger led a charge against the PCA's authority with films like the sexually-charged-for-its-time "The Moon is Blue" (1953) and the drug-themed "The Man With the Golden Arm" (1955). Both films dealt with "forbidden" subjects and were released successfully without the PCA's seal of approval—the first significant cracks in the Code's authority.

In the 1960s, the Production Code Administration quickly fell victim to the pace and energy of the times. Audiences fervently supported a new, aggressive wave of cinema which empowered filmmakers over the studios. As the studios became mortally hobbled by an inability to anticipate changing audience tastes, landmark films by dynamic young directors began to slip into release.

In 1966, the double-blows of Mike Nichols' "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" and Michelangelo Antonioni's "Blow-Up" raised many eyebrows—including the government's. "Woolf" was chastised for flaunting such scandalous (for the time) dialogue as "screw" and "hump the hostess." The foreign-made "Blow-Up," meanwhile, became the first studio release to contain nudity. The ratings system had yet to be created, but Valenti was able to negotiate slight concessions from Warner Bros., which released "Woolf," and from MGM, which had acquired "Blow-Up." Valenti would later write that he really didn't feel it right for grown men to sit around a studio discussing ways to remove the word "screw" from an accomplished motion picture.

Victorious in his quest to replace mandatory PCA censorship with voluntary MPAA labeling, Valenti's ratings plan went into effect on November 1, 1968. All film releases from MPAA member companies were required to carry one of four MPAA rating codes: "G," "M" (soon changed to "GP" and later "PG"), "R," and "X." Additionally, any film created or released outside the aegis of MPAA member companies could submit itself for ratings consideration.

The "PG-13" category was added in 1984, and "X" was replaced with "NC-17" in 1990. The MPAA edict—to "provide advance information to enable parents to make judgments on movies they want their children to see or not to see"—has been widely embraced over the past 30 years and, according to various polls, seems to serve parents well.

MPAA ratings are exclusive to releases in the United States. An international lobbying division of the MPAA, called the Motion Picture Association (or MPA) works to ensure an open, non-restrictive marketplace for American entertainment overseas. As a demonstration of its influence under Valenti, the MPA has earned the nickname "the little State Department" for its willingness to immerse itself in tough negotiations on behalf of its members.

Founded in the aftermath of World War II, during a time when anti-U.S. trade restrictions were pummeling the country, the Motion Picture Export Association of America (the name was shortened to Motion Picture Association in 1994) works to "reestablish American films in the world market, and to respond to the rising tide of protectionism resulting in barriers aimed at restricting the importation of American films." Today, the MPA's duties have grown to include liaison duties, the drafting of treaties, and the direction of worldwide anti-piracy efforts.

Under Jack Valenti's guidance, the combined MPAA/MPA has become a vital, pro-active force protecting every constituent of the American motion picture industry. It's a high standard of accomplishment, and with the recent explosion of such advances as digital media, video-on-demand and direct satellite transmission, Valenti and the MPAA's most important work could very well lie ahead.

BLAST FROM HIS PAST

Jack Valenti on the State of Film Content, 1970

The following bylined article was authored by Jack Valenti for our issue of July 20, 1970. It originally appeared under the title "Are Walls Crumbling Down?"

Themes for children: A homosexual episode between two 13-year-old boys... A girl's first menstruation... An unwanted pregnancy. Are the walls crumbling down? Can't you hear the wails of defamers of the movies? "Obscene and decadent... lurid and demoralizing... the ratings system is a fraud..."

But wait. These aren't movie themes at all. Not movies...not really? No, not movies at all. These are themes of recent new books for children. Children are buying them. All ages are welcome. No problem, no trouble, no restraint...just pay at the cash register as you go out.

Is there any criticism in the press, any flood of censorship and classification bills introduced in legislatures? Do newspapers or radio or television refuse advertisements for these books for children? If there's a ripple, the rumbling hasn't been picked up by my ears.

Now, I haven't read the books and I don't condemn them. I don't point a finger. I think that writers and publishers should give children and young people a more accurate view of life, if parents choose for their children to read these books.

But imagine if the three themes were in movies, were emphasized in movie advertisements. How many persons would have waited to see the movies before blasting the film business? It seems to me to be an imperishable rule that you are best qualified to denounce the movie that you haven't seen. And not just one film but all films, and the motion picture industry and its people to boot. When you see a film you have to undergo the agony of knowing what you're talking about.

Let us suppose some more. Suppose the movies are rated R or X. How many advertisements would be refused? Is there anyone who needs the answer to be spelled out?

I think that movies, like books, in drawing on life and man's experiences, should give a more honest view, too. I contend that the comparison with books does not stop there. I don't think there should be a double standard, one for literature, another for the screen. I believe that the same criteria of judgement should apply to both. It mangles truth to maintain that what is permissible for a child in a book is impermissible for a child in film.

It could reasonably be said, I believe, that, if anything, harsher judgements could be made about books. A youngster reads a book alone. Alone, he can become in imagination prey to visions and distortions stirred by the reading. A child sees a movie in a theatre in the company of peers and grownups. Any impressions from the screen are filtered and softened by a feeling of closeness and security arising from this comfortable association.

Again, I am not here to pin devil's ears on book publishers. I am for book publishers... and I am for motion picture producers. Really, if anyone should entertain the slightest doubt, it is the parent that I have in mind. I am for parents and I am for movies, too. I think, though, that just as double vision is not good for driving an auto, it is not good for looking upon movies. A parent, I feel, should view a movie in the same light as he does a book. Is it suitable for my child? Is the theme treated with taste and decency, with reasonableness and respectability? Is my child mature and settled enough to understand and cope with it?

If these questions should perplex a parent, and I think they should, I have a suggestion. Make a companion of the motion picture rating system and let it serve as a guide. It will not provide all the answers for every parent and every child, but it is the best place to start that I know.

Parents who have followed the ratings since the system began on November 1, 1968 have had plenteous numbers of films from which to choose. More than two-thirds of all films rated in this period have been in the unrestricted categories: G and GP, all ages. The figures are 479 G- and GP-rated films out of a total of 710 rated through June of this year.

Aside to readers in the industry: These are some of the things I say when I talk to parents. I find, far more often than not, that we can come to a common meeting ground where reason and reasonableness rule. Perhaps more of us should engage in dialogues with parents... and with patrons? It's a way to stop walls from crumbling down.—Jack Valenti

SIXTH SENSE

China's Independent "Sixth Generation" Takes Risks and Makes Art for Today's Asia

by Karen Achenbach

The films of Communist China's newest group of directors, the so-called "Sixth Generation," could be mistaken for independent films from any capitalist country. Their plots are filled with rockers, abortions, homosexuals, adulterers, tiny apartments in dirty cities—all dangerously taboo topics to Chinese bureaucrats. But to young filmmakers, these are important portrayals of life in China today, particularly of Beijing's urban youth, who, after seeing the hopes of their generation crushed at Tiananmen, live with tightening government restrictions while being exposed to western products, information, and trade. And talk about independent: Because it's the only way to get their "taboo" films made, filmmakers work outside the government's studio system in a country where to do so is illegal.

FROZEN OUT: The director of the allegorical "Frozen" goes by the Chinese term for "No Name" to avoid suppression from the Chinese regime.

China numbers each distinct group of its filmmakers by generation. Zhang Yimou ("To Live"), Chen Kaige ("Farewell, My Concubine"), and Tian Zhuang-zhuang ("The Blue Kite") are of the Fifth Generation, members of the Beijing Film Academy's first graduating class in the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution—the blackest period in modern Chinese history, during which vast purges of Chinese society were mounted in the name of purifying the Communist body politic of Western and other anti-communist ideas. Mere children who fled into the countryside during that infamous period of Maoist oppression, today the Fifth Generation filmmakers make films of their experiences—films often critical of the Cultural Revolution, as well as the policies it fostered.

Sixth Generation directors, on the other hand, are generally defined by five interlocking factors. One, they are usually the inheritors of the legacy of the Cultural Revolution, rather than actual participants in its events. Two, they graduated in 1989—the year of the Tiananmen massacres. Three, as former students, they were suspect within China's "official" film industry because of Tiananmen. Four, they wanted to make films immediately, so they chose to make independent, though illegal, films. And five, they regard the films of the Fifth Generation as not radical enough, and want to make new films to show the truth of Chinese society today. As Berenice Reynaud, a scholar and critic specializing in Chinese films, puts it, "For the last two or three years, I would say that the term 'independent cinema' in China and the term 'Sixth Generation' have been synonymous."

In August, L.A. audiences saw the U.S. premiere of "Frozen," a recent Sixth Generation independent film. Made without government knowledge, smuggled out of China, and put through post-production in Rotterdam, "Frozen" was directed by the anonymous Wu Ming (Chinese for "No Name") and screened in "Electric Shadows '97: A Pan-Asian Film Festival," presented by the UCLA Film and Television Archive in association with the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. Wu remains unnamed because, if discovered, he could be permanently banned from filmmaking in China.

Feng Xun, a Chinese national and producer of "Frozen," describes her generation: "In the old days people had to work for five or six years to gain the experience before they're allowed to direct. Some young people couldn't wait, so they went ahead and made independent films by themselves, which brought some of them bad luck. They were 'frozen,' which means the [government-controlled] studio—and labs—will not sponsor you to make any film in the future."

"Frozen" focuses on a Beijing performance artist so upset by the state of things that he ends up dead. For his last performance, he melts chunks of ice with his body heat. The artist is a muscular 20-something with a laconic drawl and post-modern ennui. That he appears Westernized to Westerners and a spoiled brat to older Chinese is of a piece with what China, a deeply divided country, is experiencing today.

Charles Ruas, author, critic, and a Fulbright Scholar who has taught in China, explains: "Most Western experimental art acts against a known value in the culture. With artists in Communist China, the idea for the experiment doesn't come from within, it comes from outside, and it comes from the west."

Ruas sees this gravitation by younger Chinese artists to models from the West as an

IT IS WITH SINCERE GRATITUDE AND PRIDE THAT WE ANNOUNCE THAT THE MANUFACTURER OF THE YEAR AWARD WAS PRESENTED TO EDW. H. WOLK, INC., AT THE ITEA MEETING IN VAIL, COLO. THIS AWARD MEANS A GREAT DEAL TO US BECAUSE IT WAS VOTED ON BY YOU, OUR CUSTOMERS. THANK YOU!

unintended consequence of the Cultural Revolution, which imprisoned, tortured and/or executed an entire generation of Chinese artists, writers and philosophers, as well as millions from other walks of life. "They were all punished, banished and killed," says Ruas. "All. Anyone with any skill. Not just intellectuals and artists, but elementary school teachers, the garbage man, the policeman, anyone who had a specific function was attacked. People used [the Cultural Revolution] to exact vengeance on their neighbors or on people they didn't like, and the whole society went out of control."

How out of control did China become during the Cultural Revolution? According to Ruas, French sociological teams described evidence of ritual cannibalism in many outlying villages. "You'd expect communities to be able to hold together, but they had been disintegrated by the extremity of the violence to the level of this horrifying, barbaric, pre-civilization ritual."

After Mao died in 1976, people were brought in from the countryside and put back into their old apartments and old jobs, right beside the citizens who had informed on them to the government. Their attackers were unpunished; some had been even been promoted for their "service."

The government policy was to forget the Cultural Revolution ever happened. This meant that films criticizing the Revolution were banned. Today, that ban extends to films criticizing any part of Chinese society.

China's leading Sixth Generation director is Zhang Yuan. His 1990 debut film, "Mama," was hailed as the first Chinese independent movie since 1949. A semi-documentary about a mother and her retarded son, "Mama" was smuggled out of China. The next three of Zhang's films were officially banned: the 1993 rockumentary "Beijing Bastards," 1994's "The Square" (about Tiananmen), and the 1996 documentary "Sons."

Zhang's new film, "East Palace, West Palace," is based on the trouble Chinese AIDS clinics have finding men who will admit to being homosexual. It was made with French co-producers, who screened the movie at Cannes despite Chinese government prohibitions. In retaliation, Zhang's passport was seized. Because of this and similar incidents, China has instituted regulations to control all film negatives on foreign co-productions in order to secure the government's power to censor Chinese films, or to prohibit them from screening at festivals, no matter who owns the copyright.

In addition, new campaigns against what is euphemistically called "spiritual pollution" have been initiated—campaigns Zhang fears could make directors avoid certain topics. Except that those topics, by their appeal in the West, bring in the hard currency China's film industry needs.

According to Reynaud, China's push toward privatization has meant that "in the last two or three years, the situation has changed. It is still illegal to make movies outside of the [government-financed] studio system, but the studios can no longer afford to produce movies." The studios are allowed to make a certain quota of films per year, so they sell quotas (essentially, permission to make a film) to independent production companies throughout China, including 20 to 30 foreign co-producers per year—foreigners who often want films dealing in the very sensationalized topics the Chinese government wants banned. These movies are made using none of the studio's resources, but they retain the studio stamp. This means the studio can refuse to distribute the movie on the Chinese mainland, which makes investors very leery.

> "For the last two or three years, I would say that, in China, the term 'independent cinema' and the term 'Sixth Generation' have been synonymous."

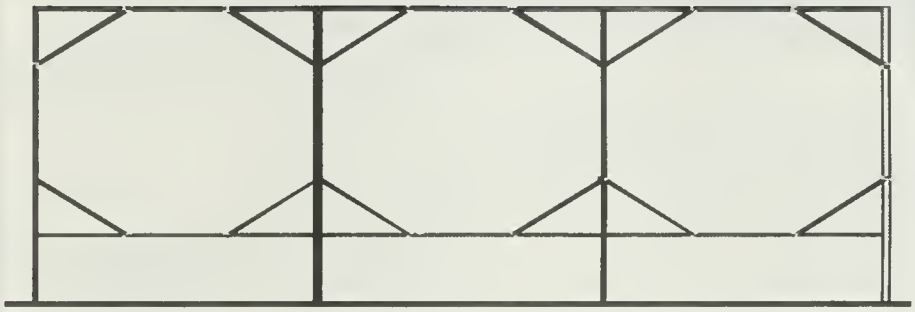
But all of China is in conflict between socialist control and capitalist reward. Despite government regulations and censorship, there is a thriving underground for banned culture. According to some, the only requirement to stay clean with the law is enough money to bribe your way out of trouble.

"The younger generation peddles cigarettes and leather jackets or Nikes to make quick money," says Ruas. But Ruas warns that the present Chinese government is run by "brutish hardliners" who have "eliminated all dissent from Tibet, from China, even eliminating people as innocuous as union organizers" and people working to fund Chinese social security or put an eight hour cap on workdays. According to Ruas, in today's China, nearly any social activity can be judged as seditious if it is seen as blocking the government's interests in competing in the global business economy.

Money talks in filmmaking too. Tian Zhuang-zhuang's "The Blue Kite" (seen on U.S. cable in 1997) was a studio-made film, but he shot a script different than the one the studio approved. As a result, Tian was blacklisted, forced to resign from the studio where he'd worked for 10 years, and banned from film work in China for five years. Yet one year later Tian was at the Beijing Film Studio, overseeing production there because the studios respond to the market, and his film had found an audience in the west.

With approximately 18 Film Studios in China, annual domestic production is between 150 and 200 features, though boxoffice is dominated by foreign films. In 1994, the Ministry of Radio, Film and Television decided to import 10 overseas films a year for "boxoffice sharing" including "The Fugitive" and "True Lies." (Of the high-profile U.S. titles the Ministry imported, only "Forrest Gump" flopped. The Chinese thought the passive Gump was not heroic.)

In 1996, foreign films accounted for 70-80 percent of China's total boxoffice revenues. Meanwhile, the mainland's domestic industry is failing, due in part to a reluctance to distribute much of the domestic product.



If the government's Film Bureau continues to ban films, foreign investors may withdraw from China. The international market can only sustain one or two independent Chinese films a year, which means foreign co-productions have to get a return on their investment in China itself. "The market [for Chinese-language films] is in China," says Reynaud. "So if [the Film Bureau] keeps films from being distributed in China, it means that the Film Bureau is going to kill the Chinese film industry, and everybody's very worried about that."

The Sixth Generation, commonly perceived as being less political than the Fifth, is taking economic action by staying outside the official industry. "Once you start working within the studio system, they have you," says Reynaud. "They give you the money or they don't give you the money. They release your film or they don't release your film. If you're totally illegal [like the Sixth Generation directors], they won't put you in jail. They'll take your passport away, but then they have to give it back at some point. If you're totally illegal, they have no hold over you. Of course, it's also a difficult life."

"I'd prefer to choose a more comfortable and normal way of making films," says producer Fen Xun. "But if they [the Film Bureau] still place us in this position and restrict our freedom, then I hope to continue to make independent films."

THE WINTER GUEST ★★★1/2

Starring Emma Thompson and Phyllida Law. Directed by Alan Rickman. Written by Sharman Macdonald and Alan Rickman. Produced by Ed Pressman, Ken Lipper and Steve Clark-Hall. A Fine Line release. Drama. Rated R for language and brief sensuality. Running time: 106 min. Screened at Montreal. Opens 12/19 ltd.

Though stateside audiences were introduced to British actor Alan Rickman via his bad-guy turn in "Die Hard," the British actor is really a serious sort, as shown by his more existential turns in "An Awfully Big Adventure" and "Michael Collins." So it's likely little surprise to art-house-goers that Rickman in his feature directing debut brings to the screen a work with terrific cast work and a certain haunting quality yet one that leaves audiences with fewer answers than questions, the most basic being, who is the winter guest?

ICE STORM: Fine Line's "The Winter Guest."

This adaptation of Sharmon Macdonald's play follows four pairs of people in a Scottish seaside hamlet on a winter day so cold the sea has frozen. Although a decent amount of time is lent to recounting the escapades of two truant boys along the shore, two old biddies taking the bus to a funeral and two teenagers falling and then not falling into precarious love, the main focus is on a depressed woman (Emma Thompson) whose self-involved husband has died and on her mother (Thompson's real-life mom, Phyllida Law), who tries to rile her daughter into a new way of existence but more often than not simply riles her.

Rickmon has brought the cloistered stage play to vibrant life throughout the tiny town, and his work with the actors is universally superb; there is not a false note struck among the compony. That said, the close-in work via dialogue between the characters and the resolute feeling of hidden symbolism hovering above the proceedings make this, like "An Awfully Big Adventure," a pleasurable sit only for moviegoers who like the microscopism of introspection. Except for a careful reticence in telling his tale of peaple living on a land closed off by ice, Rickman makes nary a slip.—Kim Williamson

ELECTRIC SHADOWS FEST '97

"Electric Shadows '97: A Pan-Asian Film Festival," held this past August at UCLA in conjunction with the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, provided a look at the creative hotbed that is new Asian cinema. Below, we review four of the offerings, including two that will be seeing stateside release in 1998. BOXOFFICE also previously reviewed three other significant titles shown at Electric Shadows: Park Chul-soo's "Farewell My Darling" (March 1997 issue), Tsai Ming-liang's "The River" (June 1997) and Oguri Kohei's "The Sleeping Man" (April 1997). "Films produced in Asia...have moved from highly specialized venues, of interest to only a handful of cinephiles, into the mainstream of international film production and the cutting edge of cinematic innovation," says Robert Rosen, director of UCLA's Film and Television Archive. His comment is borne out below.

FROZEN ★★1/2

Starring Jia Hongshen, Ma Xiaoqing, Bai Yu and Li Geng. Directed by Wu Ming. Written by Pang Ming and Wu Ming. Produced by Xu Wei and Shu Kei. An International Film Circuit release. Drama. Mandarin-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 99 min.

COOL WOMAN: "Frozen" co-producer Feng Xun.

A depressed young artist eventually decides to do a performance art piece wherein he melts blocks of ice with his body heat (he's not acting) until he becomes hypothermic. This 1997 Chinese film, which was shot guerilla-style in China because it's illegal to make a film without approval, was based on a real artist who later killed himself, and has some of the most exceptional cinematography coaxed out of 16mm film.

Although it's wonderful that young Chinese filmmakers are making gritty, semi-documentary urban tales, this one is interesting only because it's not the usual fare from the mainland. A featured (not lead) character has the most dynamic scene, an extremely funny sequence during which he attempts to convince psychiatric doctors that his friend, not he himself, is the one who needs their help. Another noteworthy element is performance artists shown eating soap; one would hope they are acting, but they aren't.—Karen Achenbach

TWO PUNKS ★★★1/2

Starring Osawa Takao, Dankan, Kataoka Reiko and Aoyama Chikako. Directed by Aoyama Shinji. Written by Kaneko Shoji. Produced by Kai Naoki, Nagasawa Katsuaki and Okagawa Akimoto. A There's Corporation, Tokyo production; no stateside distributor set. Action/drama. Japanese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 99 min.

Written by the late Kaneko Shoji, who liked to depict the yakuza as imperfect and troubled, "Two Punks" ("Chinpira," a 1996 Japanese production) is a touching "Donnie Brasco"-like story of an ambitious country kid getting himself to Tokyo and hooking up with an older yakuza associate (Osawa Takao), who's not a "made" guy. Played by rising star Dankan, the young mover is an original character who behaves against every expectation and continually surprises. The yakuza also notice his unusual responses, and he benefits.

This is Aoyama Shinji's third film, a deceptive work that quietly weaves an emotional web that by film's end captures viewers completely. The two men are bookies that appear more like slackers. The younger, seen in present time at the beginning of the movie and then in flashbacks, recites a poem in scattered pieces throughout: "Under the gold and silver neon waves," "Tokyo the capital of glory," "Yakuza isn't the only life," "Beauty is not only for women."

Aoyama builds with interesting sound techniques: a yakuza chief on acid is stabbed in a pachinko parlor, and as he staggers until dead all sound stops. The film's score is an outstanding solo guitar by famed rock guitarist Makato Ayuakawa. Good-looking men in nice suits, the pieces of poem ("skyscrapers, tombstones"), some memories, many actions, the guitar score—all these move the story forward without noticeable intensity until the sudden and brutal confluence of all the elements. though plot weakness due to having the characters make simply stupid moves diminishes the logic of the ending, its power is irrefutable. The whole of the young man's life has been expressed, including a precious lesson and its tremendous cost. YIN AND YANG: GENDER IN THE CHINESE CINEMA ★★★★

Starring John Woo, Tsui Hark, Ang Lee, Chen Kaige and Leslie Cheung. Directed by Stanley Kwan. Written by Edward Lam. Produced by the British Film Institute. A Miramax release. Documentary. Mandarin- and Cantonese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 82 min.

This 1997 Hong Kong production, the latest installment of the British Film Institute's "Cenentary of Cinema" TV series, is an invaluable record of the world's premier Asian directors as they talk about their filmmaking in interviews organized around the question, "Are Chinese movies intentionally homoerotic?" Stanley Kwan, a gay male director from Hong Kong, has a topic that international audiences love to debate, plus scenes from Hong Kong action, Taiwanese gay punk, and kung fu movies of all types. Fifty years of Chinese cinema is reviewed, but the draw is to see and hear these giants, a too-rare and infinitely repeatable pleasure.

Surprising pieces of information include: Until the '50s, Chinese cinema gave top billing only to women; and a certain female actress in the '50s and '60s who played the man in a famous screen couple off the screen lived with her co-star. The director's mother makes a profound impression when asked about society's disapproval of her son: He's gay, he's successful, and he takes care of her—they deserve a good life. Miramax reportedly will release a dubbed version in 1998.—Karen Achenbach

YOURS AND MINE ★★★

Starring Bai Bing-bing, Gu Baoming, Hsih Li-jing and Lin Cheng-sheng. Directed and written by Wang Shaudi. Produced by Huang Liming. A Rice Film Intl. production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy. Mandarin and Hokkien language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 114 min.

HIS AND HERS: Scenes from "Yours and Mine."

This Taiwanese production (aka "My Insanity" and "Things That Drive Me and You Crazy") is an intriguing look at modern Taipei through the misadventures of an interweaving bunch of its citizens. A trio of punk kids with dyed red and yellow hair steal cars and set up teenage girls for kidnap by gangsters; a rich surgeon (famed comedian Gu Baoming) thwarts thieves as well as he schemes. Also starring rock singer Hsih Li-jing and filmmaker Lin Cheng-sheng, the film moves like episodic TV, though its themes are more serious and current: loneliness, poverty, and fear of crime. Most amusing is the surgeon's desperate plea to his daughter, just back from L.A., to speak Mandarin, please!

Before the film's release in Taiwan, female lead and noted talk-show host Bai Bing-bing's teenage daughter was kidnapped and murdered in an extortion attempt. That event's similarity to the film's plotline highlights the fact that Taiwan has the second most kidnappings in the world. (Singapore has even more.) — Karen Achenbach

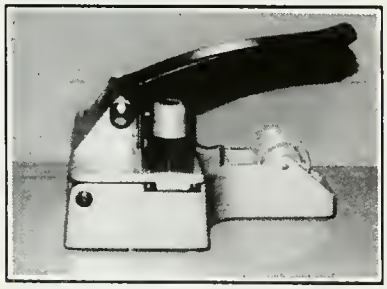
X-WING VS. TIE FIGHTER ★★★



LucasArts; Windows '95; $42.95.

Those wizards at George Lucas' computer game company, LucasArts, are at it again. "X-Wing Vs. Tie Fighter," developed in conjunction with Totally Games, is the latest entry in the ever-growing collection of "Star Wars"-themed computer games, allowing the player to act out his "Skywalkerion" fantasies of being a starfighter pilot engaged in the great space war between the forthright Rebels and the Evil Empire. And, like the re-releases of the "Star Wars" movies earlier this year, this new game is not so much a sequel as it is an update: bigger in scope and better at graphics, but essentially the some old thing. "X-Wing Vs. Tie Fighter" is a flight combat simulation in which a player can choose to be a Rebel Alliance pilot (as in the earlier game "X-Wing") or an Imperial Fleet pilot (as in the earlier "Tie Fighter"). The visuals are much improved from the older product, with high-resolution 16-bit graphics, and there are more keyboard commands, giving the player better control of his spacecraft.

Although these upgrades do create an incredibly lifelike three-dimensional universe, the game is still a flight-based "shoot-'em-up," a type that has glutted the market for a decade. The best improvement is the ability for "multi-player" combat, in which several people can connect through modems or even via the Internet to play together at the same time, flying either for the Rebellion or the Empire. This type of "head-to-head" gaming has been a standard feature on other programs for years, but this is the first time it's been available for one set in the "Star Wars" universe. This feature alone is enough to recommend the game to longtime fans. They finally receive their wish: to join with friends (or compete against them) in the battle for domination of the universe.—Michael Payne

FLASHBACK: APRIL 5, 1947

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

[Made in 1946 by England's Rank/Cineguild and then imported by Universal-International, David Lean's "Great Expectations" was Oscar-nominated for best picture, script and direction and won for cinematography and art direction. A contemporary version from Fox opens limited this Dec. 31 and goes wider in January. Here's what BOXOFFICE said about Lean's work.]

A reasonably faithful screen adaptation of the Charles Dickens classic that captures all of the flavor and much of the warmth and charm of the literary original, "Great Expectations" is a well-acted, superbly photographed period piece. It will add prestige to the Universal-International program, even if it will require strong selling to offset its lack of marquee names. Its audiences will be drawn chiefly from the oldsters with fond memories of Pip's adventures and from the students and younger readers of Dickens' works. Because director David Lean has lingered fondly over many scenes and introduced countless subsidiary characters, the footage is overlong, meaning average audiences could find it slow-moving.

SELLING ANGLES:

Except for two members who have a following in art theatres—John Mills, who played in "In Which We Serve," and Valerie Hobson, recently in "The Years Between" and other British films—the cast is lacking in marquee power. Concentrate on the Charles Dickens angle by arranging tieups with bookshops for displays of this and other works by the famous author. Put window cards or display boards in public libraries or in school reading rooms.

ILL GOTTEN GAINS 1/2

Starring Djimon [Hounsou], Akosua Busia, De'Aundre Bonds and Clabe Hartley. Voice by Eartha Kitt. Directed, written and produced by Joel Ben Marsden. A Spats Film release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 102 min.

Sadly, "Ill Gotten Gains" is an amateurish and often unintentionally comical treatment of the African slave trade. Resembling nothing less than a "Saturday Night Live" parody of Steven Spielberg's upcoming "Amistad," this $2 million black-and-white production will beat Spielberg into the marketplace but won't cause him to lose any sleep.

Set on a clipper anchored off the Guinea Coast of Africa in 1869, "Ill Gotten Gains" chronicles a rebellion by African captives against pirates who have seized them in violation of international laws forbidding slavery. Debuting filmmaker Joel Ben Marsden destroys any sense of period versimilitude, however, by filling his script with 1990s slang and profanity. His storytelling style is crude and pretentious, but Ben Kufrin's striking, high-contrast photography gives the film a veneer of professionalism.—Joseph McBride

Starring James Spader, Kyra Sedgwick, Helen Mirren and Albert Brooks. Directed by Sidney Lumet. Written by Steven S. Schwartz. Produced by Steven S. Schwartz and Sidney Lumet. A Live release. Satire. Rated R for language and a scene of sexuality. Running time: 109 min.

The essential callowness that audiences have come to associate with James Spader characters doesn't provide a strong central heartbeat to support "Critical Care," Sidney Lumet's scathing assault on modern medicine, but nevertheless this Live/Village Roadshow/ASQA co-production gradually finds its own strong lifeline, establishing a tone and momentum that prove successful. Spader plays Dr. Ernst, an ambitious young medic who, because of a lack of care and an absence of caring, and due to his urge to dally with a teasing blonde (Kyra Sedgwick), finds himself swept into a nightmare: the ethical void of contemporary critical-care medicine.

As Dr. Ernst is learning his morality lesson, the script cuts cruelly and sharply to the cold heart of reality and finds bleak and crazy humor in exposing the horrifying hypocrises that bind society's notions of life and death. Helen Mirren ("Some Mother's Son"), as the practical but true nurse, as always gives a sterling performance, and Albert Brooks ("Mother") is subtle as a mercenary old sot.—Bridget Byrne

I LOVE YOU, I LOVE YOU NOT ★★★

Starring Jeanne Moreau, Claire Danes and Jude Law. Directed by Billy Hopkins. Written by Wendy Kesselman. Produced by Joe Caracciolo Jr., John Fiedler and Mark Tarlov. A CFP release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 91 min.

In the coming-of-age "I Love You, I Love You Not," Claire Danes is Daisy, a shy student in a posh private school who occasionally feels like an outsider because of her Jewish lineage. In typical teen fashion, Daisy is infatuated with the school's Golden Boy, Ethan (Jude Law); though she can't even bring herself to speak to him, he notices her glances and begins to court her.

Nana (Jeanne Moreau), the loving, wry grandmother whom Daisy visits each weekend, is a true confidante to her beloved granddaughter. In turn, Nana shares with Daisy the hardships she suffered as a girl during the Holocaust. Nana's younger self in these scenes is played by Danes, further illustrating the identification between the two. Daisy is haunted yet fascinated by these accounts, representing her own struggle to accept her heritage and herself.

It's a simple yet elegant and authentic portrait of the delicate emotions of a delicate girl, and of how her grandmother teaches her to embrace an aspect of herself she once viewed with shame, strengthening her. Moving performances are given by Moreau and Danes.—Christine James

A LIFE LESS ORDINARY ★★

Starring Ewan McGregor, Cameron Diaz and Holly Hunter. Directed by Danny Boyle. Written by John Hodge. Produced by Andrew MacDonald. A Fox release. Romance. Rated R for violence and language. Running time: 104 min.

The first Hollywood feature by the human hat trick (Boyle-Hodge-MacDonald) that came up with the edgy and hilarious junkie comedy "Trainspotting" doesn't even come close. The plot of "A Life Less Ordinary" is, actually, quite ordinary. Robert (Ewan McGregor), sporting a Bay City Rollers haircut, is fired as a janitor and retaliates by kidnapping the boss' spoiled daughter, Versace-clad Celine (Cameron Diaz, with an unconvincing snarl), who winds up having to give the hapless Robert how-to's. Meanwhile, two angels (Holly Hunter and Delroy Lindo) must make the pair fall in love or face censure from the ultimate Boss. Who'd have thought the 1983 Olivia Newton-John/John Travolta "Two of a Kind" would be such an influence on these maverick filmmakers?

In fact, a lot of "A Life Less Ordinary" has been done elsewhere, usually to better effect. A karaoke scene ("My Best Friend's Wedding" redux) in a rural bar becomes a '30s-style dance number: hello, Dennis Potter. Bullets fly with comic-book abandon; nods to Quentin T. The one original thing is Hunter's turn as a fierce angel.—Melissa Morrison

THE DEVIL'S ADVOCATE ★★★

Starring Keanu Reeves, Al Pacino, Charlize Theron, Jeffrey Jones, Judith Ivey and Craig T. Nelson. Directed by Taylor Hackford. Written by Jonathan Lemkin and Tony Gilroy. Produced by Arnon Milchan, Arnold Kopelson and Anne Kopelson. A Warner Bros. release. Thriller. Rated R for sexuality, nudity, violence and language. Running time: 152 min.

Despite the obvious pitfalls associated with casting Keanu Reeves as an attorney, "The Devil's Advocate" actually manages to serve up one of the season's juicier entertainments, a conventional fantasy/thriller executed with unconventional panache and anchored by dazzling performances from Al Pacino and Charlize Theron.

Audiences able to stay with the film through an overlong introduction (nearly 90 minutes) will find their efforts rewarded in the latter hour as the masks are drawn away and the sinister and even satanic plottings of law firm founder John Milton (Pacino) are revealed. The good news about Reeves is that, though he is still predictably bad and horribly miscast, he's not intolerable.

With the exception of a cheap, derivative post-climatic tag and a penchant for letting dialogue scenes drag on, scripters Jonathan Lemkin and Tony Gilroy have respectably adapted Andrew Neiderman's novel, giving director Taylor Hackford the chance to vigorously, if bombastically, exercise his highly stylistic sensibilities.—Wade Major

I KNOW WHAT YOU DID LAST SUMMER ★★★

Starring Jennifer Love Hewitt, Freddie Prinze Jr. and Sarah Michelle Gellar. Directed by Jim Gillespie. Written by Kevin Williamson. Produced by Neal H. Moritz, Erik Feig and Stokely Chaffin. A Columbia release. Horror. Rated R for strong horror violence and language. Running time: 100 min.

Scripter Kevin Williamson ("Scream") avoids the sophomore slump by building on the best of that first film's hallmarks: blenderizing the funny and the scary. "I Know What You Did Last Summer" does it more successfully than its monosyllabic predecessor, as when a schlocky beauty pageant is crosscut with a murder.

And like "Scream," this new entrant features a dewy cast sucked right off TV (including the "Scream" star Neve Campbell's fellow "Party of Fiver" Jennifer Love Hewitt), the tweaking of horror-film cliches, and the obligatory pop-culture references. Overall, it's a successful formula, but sometimes the seams show.

The m.o.: Hook-wielding fisherman guts his human catch. The excuse: Four teens have a hit-and-run; fearing for their futures, they toss the victim into the sea. A year later, former honor student Julie (played by Hewitt and her breasts) comes home from college with pasty skin and bad grades; her best friend, dishy beauty queen Helen (Sarah Michelle Gellar and her breasts), has given up her acting dreams and works behind the perfume counter. Their exbeaus (Freddie Prinze Jr. and Ryan Phillippe) are also failures. And now someone's terrorizing them about the previous summer's events.

The galoshes-wearing killer isn't as scary as "Scream's" costume goblin; in fact, he looks like the logo for Fisherman's Friend throat lozenges. But the film has some good thrills and good jokes. You'll shriek, you'll laugh.—Melissa Morrison

EYE OF GOD ★★

Starring Martha Plimpton, Hal Holbrook, Kevin Anderson and Nick Stahl. Directed and written by Tim Blake Nelson. Produced by Wendy Ettinger and Michael Nelson. A Castle Hill release. Drama. Rated R for violence, language and depiction of abortion. Running time: 84 min.

A small-town diner waitress ("Beautiful Girls'" Martha Plimpton) has been waiting for years to meet a prisoner with whom she has been corresponding: a man (Kevin Anderson, of TV's "Nothing Sacred") who, unbeknownst to her for some reason, is incarcerated for brutally killing his pregnant wife. They meet, fall in love, and marry quickly—and she becomes pregnant.

Hal Holbrook ("The Firm") has a lovely role as a moral, world-weary cop, but writer/director Tim Blake Nelson's visually ambitious yet dramatically benign and sickeningly tragic story of a romance between a right-wing religious zealot and a woman who long ago rejected God fizzles because he—like many directors on the independent scene—substitutes cool camera stuff and exotic editing for dramatic substance.—*Jon A. PLAYING GOD ★★

Starring David Duchovny, Timothy Hutton and Angelina Jolie. Directed by Andy Wilson. Written by Mark Haskell Smith. Produced by Marc Abraham and Laura Bickford. A Buena Vista release. Drama/thriller. Rated R for strong graphic violence, gore, pervasive language and some drug use. Running time: 94 min.

David Duchovny ("Kalifornia," but better known from TV's "The X-Files") plays Eugene, a de-licensed surgeon who becomes a doctor for maniacal crime boss Raymond ("French Kiss'" Timothy Hutton), in part for the money and in part for the proximity this allows to Raymond's beautiful girlfriend Claire ("Foxfire's" Angelina Jolie). From the onset, this action/drama/thriller is as lackadaisical as its star's notoriously mellow delivery.

The protagonists are not particularly sympathetic or endangered, and the villain is not very convincingly intimidating. "Playing God," amid wanton bloodletting, tries to be introspective and philosophical, but it's about as engaging in that respect as its denouement involving car chases and bumbling cops.—Christine James

ROCKETMAN ★★1/2

Starring Harland Williams, William Sadler, Jessica Lundy, Jeffrey DeMunn and Beau Bridges. Directed by Stuart Gillard. Written by Craig Mazin and Greg Erb. Produced by Roger Birnbaum. A Disney release. Comedy. Rated PG for language, crude humor and thematic elements. Running time: 94 min.

Computer programmer Fred ("Down Periscope's" Harland Williams) has a fantasy: to be an astronaut. Suddenly, he gets his chance. Together with the woman of his dreams, Mission Specialist Julie ("The Stupids'" Jessica Lundy), Commander Overbeck ("Solo's" William Sadler) and a chimpanzee, Fred heads to Mars.

"RocketMan" is humorous at the beginning and then matures along the way. Although the Caravan production is continually enlivened by some genuinely funny moments, those splashes of humor begin to overshadow the film's theme. Yet Williams' brand of humor and timing show he has, if not the right stuff, at least the right stuffing.—Dwayne E. Leslie

GANG RELATED ★★

Starring James Belushi, Tupac Shakur, Lela Rochon, James Earl Jones and Dennis Quaid. Directed and written by Jim Kouf. Produced by Brad Krevoy, Steve Stabler and John Bertolli. An MGM/Orion release. Drama. Rated R for strong language, some violence and a scene with nudity. Running time: 106 min.

Cops Divinci ("Race the Sun's" James Belushi) and Rodriguez ("Gridlock'd's" Tupac Shakur) use impounded narcotics and Divinci's girlfriend Cynthia ("Waiting to Exhale's" Lela Rochon) to lure drug dealers to their last deal and the duo's profit. All is going fine until one of their chalk outlines is an undercover DEA agent.

The toughness of language and abuse of authority his role involves fits Belushi, but the late Shakur spends most of his time brooding; the chemistry between them isn't there. Instead of being dirty cops, Belushi and Shakur seem more like henchmen working for the mob.—Dwayne E. Leslie

MOST WANTED ★★1/2

Starring Keenen Ivory Wayans and Jon Voight. Directed by David Glenn Hogan. Written by Keenen Ivory Wayans. Produced by Eric L. Gold. A New Line release. Action/drama. Rated R for violence and language. Running time: 99 min.

That one-man band, movie star/comedian/talk-show host Keenen Ivory Wayans, has jumped into new terrain—that of screenwriter—with "Most Wanted." His script for this political conspiracy thriller is hardly complex, ricocheting as it does between just-the-facts terseness and rather labored one-liners, but it keeps its plot moving. The actors must deal with cardboard characters, but they have fun.

As the star and protagonist, set up to be killed by apparently everyone he encounters, Wayans has the size and ease to make his mundane action hero watchable. Aiding is music video alum David Glenn Hogan in his feature debut.—Bridget Byrne

NAPOLEAN ★★1/2

Voices by Jamie Croft, Carole Skinner and Casey Siemaszko. Directed by Mario Andreacchio. Written by Michael Bourchier, Mario Andreacchio and Mark Saltzman. Produced by Michael Bourchier and Mario Andreacchio. An MGM/Goldwyn release. Adventure. Rated G. Running time: 82 min.

Occasionally charming and endearing family fare, "Napolean" is a fairly diverting live-action fantasy, fatally damaged by a stop-and-go narrative and a plain, straightforward visual style that misses the essential magic and imagination. There is much that's clever and creative in Mario Andreacchio's direction, but he crosses the line from innocence to infantilism.

The story, which Andreacchio co-scripts, concerns a curious puppy (voiceover by Jamie Croft) named Napolean; he drifts away from home in a balloon-driven basket and experiences both harrowing and amusing adventures in the Australian wilds. Friendly companions on the quest include a wise-cracking parrot. The animals are adorable, but they have more cuteness than character. For the intrepid child in all, "Napolean" is too much like a lengthened novelty short to work fully.—Dale Winogura

KISS THE GIRLS ★★1/2

Starring Morgan Freeman and Ashley Judd. Directed by Gary Fleder. Written by David Klass. Produced by David Brown and Joe Wizan. A Paramount release. Thriller. Rated R for terror, violence and language. Running time: 110 min.

Full of sound and fury and based on the best-selling novel by James Patterson, "Kiss the Girls" is endemic of what is happening in most all Hollywood films these days. The craft of the movie is impeccable, the cast is excellent and the plot has all the requisite twists and turns. But the film has no soul. For brief shining moments—a snip of dialogue here, there a look between a sublime Morgan Freeman as a serial-killer detective and Ashley Judd as a tough intern helping him—"Kiss the Girls" flirts with being about something—and then disappoints.—Susan Lambert

MATCHMAKER ★★1/2

Starring Janeane Garofalo. Directed by Mark Joffe. Written by Karen Janszen, Louis Nowra and Graham Linehan. Produced by Tim Bevan, Eric Fellner and Luc Roeg. A Gramercy release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for language. Running time: 97 min.

Bostonian sass meets romantic blarney in this comedy of Aerrors about brash political aide Marcy ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs'" Janeane Garofalo) heading to the Emerald Isle on a PR mission and finding herself caught up in a local matchmaking fest.

There's an unfortunate feeling of contrivance, which is a pity because this was the role Garofalo was born to play: strong, smart, caustic, funny and vulnerable. Her sardonic charm is on target, but no one is buying the scenario or the chemistry.—Christine James

THE LOCUSTS ★★

Starring Vince Vaughn, Jeremy Davies, Ashley Judd and Kate Capshaw. Directed and written by John Patrick Kelly. Produced by Brad Krevoy, Steve Stabler and Bradley Thomas. Drama. Rated R for sexuality. Run time: 123 min.

Southern gothic goes grotesque in this overheated tale of a drifter ("Swingers'" Vince Vaughn) come into a small ranching town, where he meets up with an alcoholic breaker of men (Kate Capshaw), her mentally troubled son ("Going All the Way's" Jeremy Davies) and a local good-time girl ("Kiss the Girls'" Ashley Judd). Instead of trying to tell one story—of psychosis, say, or incest, or murder, or blackmail—writer/director John Patrick Kelly decides to tell them all at once. He tells them heartfully, but in "The Locusts" crisis and casualty are on overload, and so is the audience.—Kim Williamson

WISHMASTER ★★

Starring Tammy Lauren, Andrew Divoff and Robert Englund. Directed by Robert Kurtzman. Written by Peter Atkins. Produced by Pierre David, Clark Peterson and Noel A. Zanitsh. A Live release. Horror. Rated R for horror violence and gore, and for language. Run time: 89 min.

Dominated by the magnetic, seductive charm of Andrew Divoff as an evil Djinn (or genie, if you will) in human form, "Wishmaster" is otherwise a lukewarm stew of supernatural horror, mythical fantasy and gratuitous gore. The cheap production values, often amateur acting and Robert Kurtzman's lively but uninspired direction keep the promising concept from reaching the intended fruition.—Dale Winogura

Voices by Fyvush Finkel, Tommy Michaels and Tovah Feldshuh. Directed by Albert Hanan Kaminski. Written by Albert Hanan Kaminski and Jacqueline Galia Benousilio. Produced by Dora Benousilio and Peter Vorkle. A CFP release. Animated. Unrated. Running time: 77 min.

The sophisticated wit and sparkle of Isaac Bashevis Singer's folk tales have been emasculated in this adaptation into a cutened, sweetened cartoon feature for the wholesome family. But Singer's positive moral lessons are intact, even if the animation is not consistently smooth or colorful to express them well enough.—Dale Winogura

INTERNATIONAL NEWS BRIEFS

PACIFIC OVERTURES

NOTES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM by Kim Williamson

LEAD STORY: HONG KONG—THE FIRST HUNDRED DAYS

HONG KONG—"There's a lot of anticipation and worry and frustration about the [Hong Kong] situation," filmmaker Tsui Hark told BOXOFFICE for our last CineAsia issue (2/97), just months before the territory's June 30 handover by the British to the Chinese. Added producer Terence Chang, "The Hong Kong film industry is not very healthy at the moment. In fact, it's never been worse." Golden Harvest vice president of production Tom Gray and Film Library Group president Alexandra Sun also shared their concerns about increased censorship of artistic expression and about the slackening success of the Hong Kong movie industry.

One hundred days after the beginning of Chinese rule, in an October speech widely carried on the region's broadcast and cable outlets and itself perhaps an acknowledgment that the world is watching the new government, Hong Kong chief executive Tung Chee-Hwa said that Hong Kong has "a first-class infrastructure, a sound legal framework, and an administration that upholds intellectual property, freedom of publication, and privacy of communication. All these serve to protect creative expression and encourage the growth of these industries."

During the two-hour address, Tung said he plans to establish a film services office that will promote film production and location shooting in Hong Kong. Local filmmakers have complained that they face constraints on location shooting that foreign filmmakers, thanks to assistance lent such visitors by the tourism authority, do not. To further build a bridge between hometown moviemakers and city hall, Tung said, broadcasting secretary Chau Tak-hay will now also chair a film services advisory committee whose aim is "to promote dialogue between the industry and government."

Boxoffice results for the week ending October 1 provided a market snapshot. Fox International's "Volcano" at HK$7.7 million ($996,222) was the #1 film and outdrew its nearest local competitor by 2 to 1, but five of the top 10—including Golden Harvest's "We're No Bad Guys," Mandarin's "Eighteen Springs" and Jade City's "Railway Rats"—were not Hollywood fare. By comparison, eight of Japan's top 10 draws for the week were American-made, as were nine of Australia's.

NEW HK HEADACHE: PREMIERES ON PPV

HONG KONG—Local exhibitors who resisted booking "The Gate of Heavenly Peace" earlier this year because the Chinese political drama was also being sold for pay-per-view TV airings now have a worry that American circuit bookers have kept in the back of their minds since MGM (in)famously debuted 1983's "The Pirates of Penzance" in theatres and on PPV. Four Miramax titles—"Basquiat," "Chasing Amy," "The Crow: City of Angels" and "Swingers"—will have simultaneous runs in theatres and on Wharf Cable TV's Cineplex platform, the PPV service offered by Hong Kong's monopoly pay TV network. Unlike the stateside experiment, in which PPV pricing was higher than that of theatre tickets, the Hong Kong scenario calls for the films to cost the same—HK$50 ($6.47)—regardless of large- or small-screen venue. Peter Tsi, who oversees Wharf's PPV operations, said he expects that boxoffice will not be affected due to planned PPV cross-promotions and because the films are not having a wide release. (Only certain United Artists theatres have booked the Miramax offerings.)

NEXT UP: NICHOLSON NOTES?

TOKYO—Noted for its capitalization of the commercial real estate industry to the tune of $20 billion, Japanese investment house Nomura Asset Capital Corp. has announced it will establish a fund of up to $1 billion to finance entertainment ventures via a variant of "Bowie Bonds," named after the $55 million worth of 10-year notes (purchased earlier this year by Prudential Insurance Co. of America) that are backed by singer David Bowie's EMI catalog and future revenues. Led by Ethan Penner, the company's Nomura Capital Entertainment Finance division will pool large numbers of music and film loans into diversified portfolios (to be repaid with future library revenue). Penner's plan would also allow a producer's percentage of a film's gross to be leveraged. Bear, Stearns & Co. and CS First Boston are other financial institutions entering this dawning market.

CHINA: BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

BEIJING—With its distribution of "Dante's Peak," monopoly film importer China Film has joined selected regional distributors in the practice of attaching advertisements to movies. The practice will continue, on a revenue-sharing basis, with the small number of Hollywood titles allowed into the country via China Film, which operates a circuit of more than 300 theatres in 15 cities.

KISSING LIGHTS UP MALAYS

KUALA LUMPUR—The Malaysian movie market continues in an expansion mode, but electricity bills at the new theatres might grow larger than expected. Tanjong Golden Village recently opened a 10-plex in Selangor outside Kuala Lumpur and has announced a 13-screener for the Kuala Lumpur City Centre, and new exhibition entrant Mega Pavilion is projecting it will have 70 screens in the nation by the year 2000. Meanwhile, though, local authorities in Kota Baru have ordered the northeastern town's two moviehouses to keep their auditoriums lit while movies are being shown to "prevent immoral acts like kissing, cuddling and other activities," says Nik Abdul Aziz Nik Mat, chief minister of the Kelantan state. The Kelantan government, dominated by members of a fundamentalist Islamic party, already require exhibitors to cover pictures of bare-headed women on one-sheets.

SYDNEY—The Hoyts circuit will open a 12-plex at South London's Bluewater shopping center in early 1999. Like homegrown competitor Village Roadshow, Hoyts is targeting Europe for its expansion plans, which include a five-year forecast for 150 screens in the United Kingdom and 160 screens in Germany. Of the $190 million raised in two recent public offerings by Hoyts, almost $75 million will be devoted to global growth. Hoyts currently operates about 1,220 screens in the Americas and Australia; topper Peter Ivany foresees 3,000 screens by the new century.

LOEWS, CINEPLEX CONFIRM MERGER PLANS

Lawrence J. Ruisi, president and CEO of LCE.

Sony Corp. of America and Cineplex Odeon have announced an agreement to merge Sony-owned Loews with Cineplex to create the world's largest theatrical exhibition company. The combined company will be named Loews Cineplex Entertainment (LCE) and will have 2,600 screens in 460 locations in North America.

According to Sony, anticipated revenues from the combined entity will amount to approximately $1 billion annually. Sony Retail Entertainment will own 51.1 percent of LCE's shares (representing 49.9 percent of the voting shares); Universal Studios will own 26 percent subsequent to a cash contribution of $84.5 million; the Charles Rosner Bronfman Family Trust will own 9.6 percent; and Cineplex Odeon shareholders will own 13.3 percent. Cineplex Odeon shares will be exchanged for shares in LCE at closing. It is estimated that the total number of shares in the combined company will be 452 million. The transaction is expected to close in approximately six months.

Lawrence J. Ruisi, currently president of Sony Retail Entertainment, has been named president and chief executive officer of LCE. "We are very excited about what we have set in motion with this combination, creating a company with significant growth capacity and the opportunity to enjoy substantial cost savings and operating efficiencies," said Ruisi in a prepared statement. "Using our expertise in designing, building and operating successful theatres, coupled with our significant cash flow and full access to capital markets, LCE will be able to aggressively participate in the dramatic changes taking place in the U.S. and Canadian marketplace, as well as pursue the many lucrative opportunities which exist in international markets."

Allen Karp, Cineplex Odeon's president and chief executive officer, will serve as chairman and chief executive officer of Cineplex Odeon Canada, the Canadian operating subsidiary of LCE. "I am proud to have seen this merger through to fruition for the benefit of our company and its shareholders," said Karp. "Additionally, this combination will benefit the Canadian film industry in that Cineplex Odeon has a long and proud history of supporting [Canadian production], and I am delighted that LCE is committed to continue that tradition."

The merger of the two exhibition giants will give LCE a key presence in 22 states, including major cities such as New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Boston, Seattle, Washington D.C. and Houston, as well as a leading position in Canada, particularly in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal. LCE's corporate headquarters will be in New York, with Canadian headquarters in Toronto.

CINEASIA EXTRA: SMART DEVICES ACQUIRES PANASTEREO LINE FROM AUSTRALIA'S RAIDEK

SMART Devices Inc. of Atlanta, Ga. has announced the acquisition of the Panastereo product line from Raidek Pty. Ltd. of Sydney, Australia. The product line includes the THX-approved Panastereo cinema stereo processor, the newly-developed Panalogic computer-based booth automation system, and a high-power booth sound monitor.

The transaction includes exclusive manufacturing rights along with current production stock and replacement parts.

Panastereo products will be manufactured entirely in the U.S. beginning January 1998. New options to the stereo processor, such as the "Circle Surround" six-channel DSP matrix, Panalogic automation integration and other features will be incorporated into the product at that time.

Raidek will stock processors and spares for customers in Pacific Rim countries, and will also maintain warranty repair facilities in Sydney. SMART has been a stockholder in Raidek Pty. Ltd. for over a year.

SHOWEST ANNOUNCES CHANGES FOR '98 CONVENTION

ShoWest '98, which will be held March 9-12 at Bally's Hotel in Las Vegas, will be making some changes this year in response to delegate feedback. Attendees at last year's convention found that the jam-packed schedule didn't allow for enough time to visit all the booths, so the trade show hours will be extended. The trade fair will run from 2 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. on Tuesday, March 10; from 10 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. on Wednesday, March 11; and from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Thursday, March 12. Additionally, there will be a Trade Fair Exhibitors Only desk in the Trade Fair office, to allow those with booths to expedite their badges, have questions answered and get information without standing in line. The Trade Fair Office will open at 7 a.m. on Monday, March 9, so badges can be obtained before move-in begins at 8 a.m. And a new Ambassador Program will put more people on the trade show floor to answer conventioneers' questions, expedite problem solving and provide general information. For more information about ShoWest, call 310-657-7724.

CENTURY'S RAMPING UP IN RENO

San Francisco-based Century Theatres is constructing a 16-plex at Park Lane Mall in Reno, Nev., as part of a redevelopment plan for the area. The 70,000-square-foot theatre, due to open this spring, will be all-stadium seating with love seats, and will have digital sound on all screens. According to Century, the Park Lane Mall is situated at one of Reno's busiest intersections, with a daily traffic count of approximately 55,000 cars. To relocate to this prime site, Century will be closing its smaller facility across the street, a theatre Century has operated for 25 years that was expanded over time from one to 11 screens. "We had the opportunity to expand at the site again, but preferred Park Lane," says Century president and CEO Raymond Syufy. "The property is centrally located and the opportunity to be situated next to restaurants, retail shops and other forms of entertainment is what we're looking for." Other Reno-area builds in the works for Century include another 16-plex and a 14-plex. Century currently operates 500 screens at 60 locations in five western states.

HOYTS' SHOPPINGTOWN SPREE

Hoyts Cinemas Corp. has opened a 10-plex in ShoppingTown Mall in Syracuse, N.Y., a market in which the circuit now operates 55 screens. In celebration of the new theatre, Hoyts hosted a special fundraiser to benefit Camp Good Days and Special Times, Inc. A reception was held which included a silent auction and a screening of the "The Peacemaker." Some of the items auctioned off included a "Peacemaker" movie poster autographed by stars George Clooney and Nicole Kidman and director Mimi Leder. Also up for bidding was a season pass entitling the holder and a guest to attend movies at any of Hoyts' theatres.

BANK INVESTMENT PAYS OFF

The Bank Street Theatre in New Milford, Conn., has reopened after extensive renovations. Over half a million dollars was invested to transform the 70-year-old, three-screen art deco theatre into a state-of-the-art complex. Every system, wall surface and fixture was either replaced or dramatically upgraded, according the Bank Street Theatre's owner and operator, Steven "Rocky" Barry. Auditoriums one and three were equipped with Dolby Surround, while auditorium number two features both Dolby and DTS systems. New high-backed chairs with cupholder armrests were installed in all three cinemas, as well as new drapery, carpeting and paint. The screen sizes have been increased in two auditoriums to stretch to 20 feet wide. The lobby was also remodeled to include a game and party room, and the exterior's art deco black and white glass facade has undergone restoration.

The renovations also uncovered two architectural features of the building not seen by the public in over 50 years: In the lobby, a previously-covered decorative terrazzo stone floor has been restored, and a pressed tin ceiling with soffit lights has been revealed underneath the marquee.

YOUNGQUIST FORMS BIRTCHER CONSTRUCTION SERVICES

Andrew Youngquist, former president of Birtcher Construction Ltd. (now known as MBK Construction Ltd.), has announced the formation of Birtcher Construction Services. The new company, based in Irvine, Calif., focuses solely on construction and management services for the theatre industry. Jim Lefler, also formerly of MBK, is senior executive vice president, and is in charge of the firm's stadium seating retrofitting division. Birtcher Construction Services has recently signed construction agreements with Pittsburgh, Calif.'s Brenden Theatre Corp.; Chicago's Kerasotes Theatres; and Shulman Theatres in Texas. The firm currently has more than 200 screens under construction.

DRIVE-IN DELIRIUM

BOXOFFICE received several letters in response to an item we published a few issues back reporting on the debut of "Drive-In Speaker," a newsletter devoted to ozoners. Most respondents simply wanted to express their gratitude for our attention to the subject of drive-ins, a form of exhibition whose decline in screen numbers is made up for by the passion of its enthusiasts. Donald C. Brown Jr. pointed out another resource for drive-in fans called "Update," a publication of the Drive-In Theatre Fanatic Fan Club in Baltimore; and Lawrence and Debrean Loy, authors of "Films, Food & Fun: A Guidebook to Operational U.S. Drive-In Theatres," also wrote to extol the D.I.T.F. Fan Club, mentioning that Good Morning America recently aired a drive-in segment in which the club was featured. The D.I.T.F. Fan Club can be contacted at P.O. Box 18063, Baltimore, MD 21220-0163; the Loys' book can be ordered by writing to P.O. Box 607, Germantown, MD 20875. And the Drive-In Speaker's D.B. Lounder has announced a new address: 62 Kensington Rd., P.O. Box 7001, Kensington, CT 06037-7001.

MOVIEFONE PHONES IN RESULTS

MovieFone has announced that a record performance for the company was reached this past summer. The interactive phone service, which provides callers with movie listings and over-the-phone ticketing, reportedly received 21 million calls during exhibition's hottest season. MovieFone's service covers 30 major markets and more than 12,000 screens.

CINEASIA EXTRA: ROBERT ROSEN AND UCLA BRING ASIAN CINEMA TO U.S.

American audiences today are familiar with films like Zhang Yimou's "Raise the Red Lantern" and Chen Kaige's "Farewell, My Concubine," but few realize that one reason these mainland Chinese films are now part of our filmgoing experience is because the UCLA Film and Television Archive and its director Robert Rosen helped bring Chinese filmmakers to the attention of the film community in the United States.

The Archive is the world's largest library of motion pictures and broadcasting materials outside the Library of Congress, and actively screens, preserves and restores film and TV treasures. Located in America's moviemaking capital, the Archive takes pains to keep Hollywood aware of films from around the globe.

For more than a decade, Rosen has been involved in foregrounding Asian cinema starting at a time when Asian filmmaking as a whole was viewed as very marginal. In the 1980s, Rosen made frequent trips to China at the invitation of the China Film Association. This was after the Cultural Revolution, during the Great Liberalization, and before Tiananmen Square. Rosen recalls, "It was a period of great effervescence—first, because there were two generations of young filmmakers, and second, because the Fifth Generation [which came of age after the Cultural Revolution] were very experimental in their approach, though their movies were not met with great favor by the film bureau and had no popular distribution in China."

Chen Kaige's first film, "Yellow Earth," was one example. "That movie was made at a tiny studio out in the provinces, with a dirt floor sound stage, and yet they made this wildly experimental movie," Rosen marvels.

Another film Rosen discovered was "The Black Cannon Incident" directed by Huang Jian-xin. "I was told informally that foreigners weren't going to see this," Rosen explains. "So when I asked at the Film Bureau they said there were no prints in Beijing, the only print was in Xi'an." (Xi'an, inland southeast from Beijing, is said to be the origin of culture because the Ming Dynasty ruled from there, and it is the site one of the approximately 18 government-controlled film studios in China.) Rosen traveled to Xi'an to see the film, loved it, and understood the prohibition. "It was really a film about China's paranoid, xenophobic fear of foreigners," Rosen explains. "Although completed in '85, it has still not been released to the Chinese public."

Later, at a banquet in Xi'an with the director of "Black Cannon," Rosen promised that within a year, "Black Cannon" and the director would be in Los Angeles. Everyone thought that would be impossible because the film was not in distribution and the government didn't want it seen by foreigners. But a year later, in January 1987, Rosen had the film and its director in Los Angeles. Rosen accomplished this by meeting in L.A. with the China Film Industry's head of international distribution. "I told him I had good news and bad news. The good news was I had seen eight films that will play internationally, that represent the directors of the future, that will win prizes at international film festivals, and that will make Chinese cinema an international cinema. The bad news is they are none of the films you want to export."

The Chinese didn't want to export these films because they were "art" films that wouldn't do well in China, and because some of the films were controversial. Rosen persisted, offering to tour the films in major U.S. cities, to pay with foreign currency (a big enticement at the time), and to guarantee international recognition for these movies. "And I got them!" Rosen exclaims. "The film series was hugely successful. This was the first major screening in the United States of the New Chinese Cinema and many of the directors we showcased began to create films that were now in wide distribution." Highlights included directors Tian Zhuang-zhuang ("The Blue Kite") and Xie Fei ("A Girl from Hunan"); the American premiere of "The Black Cannon Incident"; and "Yellow Earth," directed by Chen Kaige (now a U.S. resident) and photographed by Zhang Yimou, the two Chinese directors most familiar to American audiences today.

It was something Rosen felt very proud about doing. He concludes, "The history of motion pictures for a hundred years has been the result of an unceasing dialogue among national cinemas, where each one has been influenced by the other, directly or indirectly. The differences in viewpoint and the differences in style ultimately work to the best interests of everyone, of world cinema as a whole, and American cinema in particular." —Karen Achenbach

The Big Picture

The auteur theory pioneered by a maverick group of French film critics back in the 1950s opened up a lot of ground for American filmmakers. Basing their methodology on a group of journeyman Hollywood directors whose works had never received any serious evaluation previously, these writers, almost all of whom worked for the legendary Cahier du Cinema under editor Andre Bazin, devised a way to look at a body of work (the French word oeuvre is still used for this type of approach) and to declare "authorship" (in French "auteurism") when unifying genius could be discerned. The impact of the Cahier critics, whose ranks included future filmmakers Francois Truffaut and Jean-Luc Godard, elevated directors like Hitchcock, Kurosawa, Howard Hawks and Orson Welles into the upper rank of world artists.

A side effect of auterism was a new type of creative bond between actors and directors. Auteurism made it possible—in some cases, desirable—to locate the director-artist's presence inside his work. It became almost inevitable that if "authorship" was now to be conferred on filmmakers, the best of them would claim it in part through forming specialized relationships with talent.

Just as James Joyce had Steven Daedelus as his literary double, Godard had his Jean-Paul Belmondo, Fellini his Marcello Mastroianni, Scorsese his Robert De Niro, Kurosawa his Toshiro Mifune. In the aftermath of auteurism, collaborations between directors and particular actors who could be viewed as standing in for the filmmaker's moral and aesthetic concerns took on an added layer of meaning, an extra dimension of import and seriousness. Though this "doubling" approach wasn't new (John Ford's decades of collaboration with John Wayne spring to mind), the auteurist critics devised the methodology which helped astute observers to find hidden subtexts in these specialized collaborations—collaborations which, more often than not, were accomplished enough to live up to all that analytical heat.

Such a collaboration was the one between director John Woo with his favorite Hong Kong actor, Chow Yun-Fat, in the late 1980s and early '90s. In his native country, Chow's stardom—like De Niro's, Belmondo's and Mastroianni's—transcended his relative handful of Woo appearances: As one of Asia's topmost boxoffice attractions, he occupied (and still holds) a position with Asia's audiences similar to the one held by Mel Gibson or Tom Cruise in the U.S. But it was Chow's Woo titles—especially "A Better Tomorrow" (Woo's 1986 Hong Kong breakthrough), "The Killer" (perhaps the best film noir made anywhere since the 1940s), and "Hard-Boiled" (the torqued-up actioner that launched Woo's U.S. career)—which sealed Chow's persona for millions of moviegoers all over the world.

It has gone almost unnoticed in the U.S. that Woo—one of the hottest directors in the industry in the aftermath of back-to-back blockbusters "Broken Arrow" and "Face/Off"—is actually a very serious-minded and thematically consistent director. Like Hawks', Woo's best films revolve around loyalty; like Ford, he believes in the mythos of the heroic loner; like the American noir directors of the 1940s, his heroes move through a corrupt world, trying (and often failing) to keep some little social or spiritual corner of it safe from harm. "The Killer"—Woo's best film to date—is an instructive case in point: In it, a dispassionate hitman accidentally blinds a bargirl during an execution gone wrong, and then discovers he has a conscience when he tries—and fails—to atone for his sins against her.

Chow Yun-Fat played the title character in "The Killer," just as he stood at the moral center of each of Woo's best Hong Kong features with the exception of the little-seen "Bullet in the Head." As an icon, Chow's reputation preceded him (and Woo) within the American movie business: The shades, the dustcoat, the unapologetic cigarette and Chow's ambidextrous way with a pair of guns, have been showing up in dozens of American movies since the early 1990s—films by everyone from Quentin Tarantino at one end of the spectrum to Roger Christian at the other.

Despite their many imitators, what no one has captured about the Woo/Chow collaborations is something ineffable—an indescribable but essential quality that words can't quantify but which, during the films' very best moments, was writ large upon Chow's quicksilver changeling face. Where Jackie Chan remains Hong Kong's ultimate acrobat of physical space, Chow represents something quite different but ultimately as impressive: in Woo's hands (and in Chow's intermittent collaborations with Tsui Hark and Ringo Lam), he became the Hong Kong cinema's gymnast of emotion, an actor capable of Schwarzenegger-like physical heroism, but with a sense of moral and psychological intensity worthy of a Chinese Olivier.

American moviemaking has already been invigorated by John Woo's presence in Hollywood. With "The Replacement Killers," Chow Yun-Fat is poised to follow his mentor's lead by making his American movie debut. While it's doubtful that most moviegoers will understand the full significance of that fact—Chow, like Woo before him, has been positioned relative to his most marketable feature, the fact in this case that he looks great with a gun—this is nevertheless a moment for celebration on at least two fronts. A great filmic artist is about to arrive for the first time in mainstream American moviehouses. And perhaps more importantly, Woo and Chow are now operating again in relative proximity, which makes some sort of future collaboration all but certain. May their future projects together be fruitful and multiply.—Ray Greene
